Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I am very glad to hear from the Senator the reasons of his objection; but I can not conceive the circumstance under which I would agree with the Senator in his contention. I have stated that this document is valuable to those who are carrying on this public work and who have concurred in much that has been done by the outgoing commission. Apart from that, however, I desire to inform the Senate that, as a matter of justice to an individual, which always appeals to me very strongly when he is overborne by superior authority and power, who has saved the Government of the United States by his vigilance and his intelligence millions of dollars, it should be published. It was he who drove down the price of steel which was being imposed upon this Government from $95 a ton to $56 a ton, and it was he who prevented the construction of fabricating plants on leased lands by an auxiliary of the Steel Corporation wherein the only option given was given to the men who projected it and who would have enormously profited in the construction of ships. These things should be known. The Senate of all other bodies should know these things. I think they are well understood. I believe in the mind of well-informed public men that this gentleman is already vindicated in his stand; but I think his own statement, his own words, written in the most moderate style, making an attack on nobody, respecting the confidence of the President, expressing the greatest appreciation of the ability of Gen. Goethals, should be published in our RECORD; and, if the Senator does not see fit to withdraw his objection, it will be incumbent upon me to read the statement myself.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have no objection to the Senator reading the statement if he wants to take that course, but I want to say this to the Senator: He says that he wants this matter printed in the RECORD for the information of the members of the board. Why, Mr. President, there are only five members of the board, and I will guarantee the Senator now that every member of it has a copy of that statement in his hands to-day. That is not the object of the request of the Senator. The object is to open up this discussion between two officials of the board——

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I have the floor.

Mr. MARTIN. I was recognized by the Chair, and I have submitted a motion.

Mr. PHELAN. I yielded simply to an interruption of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. MARTIN. I did not ask the Senator to yield to me.

Mr. PHELAN. I ask a ruling of the Chair as to whether I have possession of the floor or not.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I did not ask the Senator to yield. I thought the Senator had concluded his remarks.

Mr. PHELAN. I had announced that I was about to read a statement, and the Senator from Utah stated that if I desired to read a statement I was perfectly at liberty to do so. I was proceeding to do it when I yielded, out of courtesy, to the interruption of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I did not understand the Senator to say that he was going to read the statement now.

Mr. PHELAN. I was going to read the statement now.

Mr. SMOOT. If I had so understood, of course I would have asked permission to interrupt the Senator. I understood from the way the Senator moved from his desk that, of course, he intended to read it at some future time.

Mr. PHELAN. Certainly not. There is an especial reason why it should be read to-day.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say that under the rules of the Senate the Senator can take the time of the Senate to read that into the RECORD, but it never will go into the RECORD without his reading it if I can prevent it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is compelled to state that he recognized the Senator from California; and the Chair understood that the Senator from Utah, by the consent of the Senator from California, was yielded to for the purpose of propounding an interrogation. The Chair did not recognize the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President——

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President——

Mr. PHELAN. In the form of an advertisement——

Mr. MARTIN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. PHELAN. I appeal to the Senator from Virginia that matters reflecting upon the standing and sincerity of the former president of the Shipping Board were published as an advertisement by interests, presumably the steel interests, in two Washington papers and in other papers.

Mr. MARTIN. Well, Mr. President——

Mr. PHELAN. And this is publicity that I seek to counteract, the paid advertisements of the Steel Corporation in the local papers, because the gentleman in whose behalf I speak has not the means nor inclination, by paid advertisements, of defending himself in that manner.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will withhold his point of no quorum for one moment——

Mr. MARTIN. I withhold it for a moment.

Mr. LODGE (continuing). I wish to say to the Senator from California that if this question is forced upon the Senate there will be a good many more things said than appeared in the papers.

Mr. PHELAN. Let them be said.

Mr. LODGE. I have no desire to enter on the debate, but there will be a full debate.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I should like to have an executive session; but as the Senator will not make that possible I am compelled to move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. PHELAN. I am holding the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. MARTIN. The Senator can not hold the floor against a motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks he is compelled to put the motion to adjourn.

Mr. LODGE. I make the point of no quorum, Mr. President.

Mr. MARTIN. I insist on my motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia moves that the Senate adjourn. [Putting the question.] By the sound the ayes seem to have it. The ayes have it, and the Senate adjourns.

Thereupon (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m., Tuesday, August 14, 1917) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, August 15, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, August 14, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, with all the fervor of soul, we pray for an universal peace, an honorable peace, which shall secure liberty, justice, and equal rights for every man, woman, and child, for upon no other basis in the nature of things can we hope for a lasting peace.

Quicken our faith in Thee, in human nature, and in the eternal verities. Unite us as a people with all who are struggling for the glorious consummation, that Thy name may be hallowed, Thy kingdom come, and Thy will be done in earth as in heaven.

When the anchors that faith has cast
Are dragging in the gale,
I am quietly holding fast
To the things that can not fail.

I know that right is right;
That it is not good to lie;
That love is better than spite,
And a neighbor than a spy.

* * * * *

In the darkest night of the year,
When the stars have all gone out,
That courage is better than fear;
That faith is truer than doubt.

And fierce tho' the fiends may fight,
And long tho' the angels hide,
I know that truth and right
Have the universe on their side.

Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, August 10, 1917, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following bills, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 2156. An act to authorize exploration for and disposition of potassium;

S. 2117. An act to appoint Allen M. Sumner a captain on the active list of the United States Marine Corps;

S. 2710. An act granting the consent of Congress to Webbers Falls Railroad Co., a corporation, its successors and assigns, to construct a bridge across the Arkansas River between the towns of Webbers Falls and Gore, in the State of Oklahoma; and

S. 2718. An act to authorize experiments in motor-truck delivery.

The message also announced that the President had approved the following Senate bills:

S. 2695. An act to authorize the construction, maintenance, and operation of a bridge across Little River, at or near the foot of the gar hole, about one-half mile south of the Jonesboro, Lake City & Eastern Railway bridge across Little River, Ark.;

S. 1816. An act to amend the act to regulate commerce, as amended, and for other purposes; and

S. 2356. An act to amend the act to regulate commerce, as amended, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled bills, reported that on August 10 they presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 4188. An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products; and

H. R. 4961. An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following bills were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 2117. An act to appoint Allen M. Sumner a captain on the active list of the United States Marine Corps; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 2718. An act to authorize experiments in motor-truck delivery; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

S. 2710. An act granting the consent of Congress to Webbers Falls Railroad Co., a corporation, its successors and assigns, to construct a bridge across the Arkansas River between the towns of Webbers Falls and Gore, in the State of Oklahoma; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. Representative HASKELL, of New York, wrote me a letter, which I have not here, asking for indefinite leave of absence. I think he is going into one of these training camps. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman suspend for a moment? I would like to ask leave to extend my remarks on the shipbuilding plan.

The SPEAKER. It is against the agreement.

Mr. GARNER. Under the agreement nothing can be done.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] moves that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until Friday, August 17, 1917, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of Hereford Inlet, Cape May County, N. J. (H. Doc. No. 331); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, reports on preliminary examination and survey of San Joaquin River, Cal., with a view to its improvement up to a point at or near Herndon by means of locks or dams or otherwise (H. Doc. No. 332); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

3. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication of the Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation required by the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918 (H. Doc. No. 262, part 2); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of Savannah River at North Augusta, Ga., with a view to ascertaining what, if any, revetment work is necessary in the interest of navigation (H. Doc. No. 333); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

5. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Frank S. Bowker v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 334); to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

6. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting tentative draft of provision of legislation removing the limitation on travel and subsistence expenses during the continuance of the war (H. Doc. No. 335); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. DECKER, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, August 15, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we seek Thy guidance and blessing every day in the task that has been committed to our hands. We try to unite our hearts with the hearts of millions who are seeking Thy guidance and blessing upon our Nation in this critical time. We pray that here in this Senate we may be found in accord with the highest spiritual interests, and with souls that are ever in communion with God that we may be united not only in our efforts but in our prayers and in our personal relations to God and in our desire to exalt the name of our God in the midst of the people. Hear us in our prayer this morning. Guide us in the deliberations of this day. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Monday, August 13, 1917, was read and approved.

PETITIONS.

Mr. KNOX presented petitions of sundry organizations, all in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of legislation authorizing the drafting of aliens, except alien enemies, into the military service of the United States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NELSON presented a petition of sundry citizens of the State of Minnesota, praying for the enactment of legislation to render possible the return of the bodies of our soldier dead to their home burial grounds in a sanitary and recognizable condition, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PHELAN presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from the directors of the farm-loan bureau of Merced County, Cal., indorsing the report of Herbert C. Hoover to President Wilson relative to food control, which was ordered to lie on the table.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

A bill (S. 2791) for the relief of John M. Francis; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SHIELDS:

A bill (S. 2792) to declare Nonconnah Creek, Shelby County, Tenn., navigable; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 2793) granting an increase of pension to W. H. Nichols; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. STONE:

A bill (S. 2794) granting a pension to Matilda J. Wilson; and

A bill (S. 2795) granting a pension to Mrs. Thomas Kelly; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LODGE:

A bill (S. 2796) to permit American citizens to wear medals or decorations received from certain foreign countries on entering the military or naval service of the United States; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PEACE BASES.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I offer the following resolution and ask that it be printed and go over under the rule.

The resolution (S. Res. 115) was read, as follows:

Senate resolution 115.

Resolved, as an expression of the Senate, that the following purposes are the policy of the people of the United States of America, to be attained by the war and embodied in any treaty of peace concluded:

First. Terms of peace agreeable to the United States which would be the basis of a permanent world peace are set forth by the President in his messages and public documents from time to time preceding the declaration of war, which terms and principles declared by the same have been formally ratified and approved by Congress.

Second. The Senate of the United States declares it to be its belief that the solemn purposes of the American people in declaring war is not to attempt the conquest or dismemberment of any enemy nation nor the annexation of its territory, or exacting indemnities, or interference with such form of government as it may see proper to continue, establish, or maintain, or to readjust or change the boundaries of any European nation or other powers which may be either directly or indirectly involved in or affected by the war—all such questions are not considered cause or causes to continue to wage war by the American people if the guaranties and principles herein declared shall be acknowledged and established.

Third. The independence and integrity territorially and politically of all nations at war shall be recognized and secured in any treaty of peace concluded; no smaller State shall be despoiled of territory nor oppressed in such terms of peace, but shall be jointly guaranteed the right of separate existence and development peaceably to pursue without interference its own course.

Fourth. The high seas of the world beyond marginal or territorial waters of nations are declared to be of common right and open to all civilized powers without exclusive right or authority claimed or exercised and without any restrictions in their free navigation except such as shall be imposed and applied by the laws of civilized power and such as are incident to proper search, seizure, and capture consistent with the laws of humanity heretofore announced by the President.

Fifth. Blockades of and creation of war zones on the high seas to the exclusion of neutrals as practiced by Germany shall be abandoned and not resumed nor insisted on by any of the nations concluding peace, and the principle shall be announced and adhered to by such nations that the high seas are not subject to blockade or similar interferences by any nation or nations.

Sixth. Submarine warfare as now conducted shall be declared piracy and be abandoned and prohibited for the future except within the territorial or marginal waters of the respective nations of the world.

Seventh. The nations concluding peace shall bind themselves in the event of future wars that vessels shall not be sunk on surrender or capture if the persons so captured submit, unless provision be made for the safety of passengers and crew and all who shall surrender and be made or shall themselves offer to be made prisoners of war shall be deemed such; nor shall any such persons taken at sea be denied such safety or be abandoned to perish by the elements.

Eighth. War shall not be waged against civilian, noncombatant population, not being in fortified or military posts, nor shall hospital agencies on land or sea be subject to attack or injury.

Ninth. Water courses, food, and medical supplies shall not be poisoned, nor shall poisonous instruments, implements, or means be employed in waging war.

Tenth. An enemy on land or sea who in good faith ceases all further combat and yields to his captor shall be deemed a prisoner of war and thereafter guaranteed safety and humane care and treatment.

Eleventh. Restoration and surrender shall be made of territory taken and occupied by military or naval force; the rehabilitation of Belgium and other like devastated territory shall be guaranteed and had at the joint expense of the nations concluding peace, the terms thereof to be settled by negotiations.

Twelfth It is hereby declared not to be the purpose of the American people to wage war, either severally nor jointly, for conquest or subjugation; nor is it their purpose to seize or annex the territory of any enemy nation, nor to enforce the payment of indemnities therefrom, nor to wage war merely to enable other nations so to do, nor is it the purpose of the American people to make themselves or any other nation the dominating or controlling force in Europe or elsewhere.

Thirteenth. It is declared that the American people are now waging war solely for the purpose of establishing hereafter a permanent peace, freedom of the seas, and the recognition of such humane principles as are announced by the President, and to prevent in the future the aggression by stronger nations upon weaker ones or the conquest, dismemberment, or destruction of such weaker nations.

Fourteenth. The conclusion of a treaty of peace shall provide reasonable and just limitations upon armaments and for the joint action of the signatory nations and the employment of such limited armament only in the necessary defense of such united nations against the aggression of any nation or nations. All treaties made by such signatory nations shall be public to such nations, and no secret negotiations, understanding, or treaty shall be entered into by or between such signatory nations nor with any other nations, and all such treaties so concluded shall be obligatory and binding upon such nations until the same shall be changed, modified, or abrogated by the joint consent of the nations so entering into such treaty or treaties.

Fifteenth. Such powers as have now pledged themselves to free any people or peoples who were formerly an independent nation or nations and recognize or create independent governments therefrom shall perform their pledge and the rehabilitation of smaller states or nations on the basis of independence and sovereignty within their own territories shall be made and guaranteed by peaceable negotiations and their safety provided for in any treaty of peace concluded.

Sixteenth. That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to confer with the official representatives of the European nations called the "Allied Nations" to ascertain whether the principles herein enunciated meet with the approbation of said powers with a view to the issuance of a joint statement in more definite terms as to the aims of the allied nations in prosecuting the war with the end in view that peace agreements may be reached and to communicate to the Senate the reply of said allied nations.

Seventeenth. For the establishment and maintenance of the foregoing principles the United States of America is willing to and is waging war and will continue to do so in the most effective way with all its resources and powers until a just peace shall be established in accordance with these declarations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over under the rule.

WAR AND PEACE.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I tender a resolution, which I ask may be read and lie on the table after being read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 116), as follows:

Whereas the United States is at war with the Imperial German Government, caused by acts of aggression upon the United States by the said Imperial German Government; and

Whereas by the Constitution of the United States and the laws thereunder the President of the United States is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy and during war is made the Director in Chief of all movements of war or peace; and

Whereas it must be presumed that by virtue of the position of the President of the United States and of his privileges and opportunities he has all reliable information upon which any practicable course for war or peace could be undertaken when the time for such move was appropriate and profitable: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the American people are assured by the Senate of the United States that so soon as reliable conditions make possible for peace between the warring nations which the United States could direct or suggest consistent with the just purposes for which America entered upon the war the President of the United States can be depended on to take action, and at such occasion, wherever arising, will duly inform the American people, as well as communicate with the Congress of the United States upon the subject.

Resolved further, That until such occasion so exists as hereby recited, all action taken by Congress or any Members thereof, preceding the suggestion of the President of the United States, works confusion in the discipline of the naval and military forces of the United States and embarrasses the Executive in the due performance of the duty of conducting the war with unity of action and vigor of purpose, as now devolves upon him.

Mr. LEWIS. This resolution is tendered as a substitute for resolutions on a similar subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie on the table and be printed.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN (S. DOC. NO. 78).

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a public document an address delivered by the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] before the Florida State Bar Association at Jacksonville, Fla., August 11, 1917, at a convention to which the public were invited.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MEMORIAL ON JOSEPH BENSON FORAKER.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I have here, forwarded to me by Hon. Judson Harmon, formerly Attorney General of the United States and a former governor of Ohio, a very fitting and beautiful memorial, prepared by a very distinguished committee, and read a few weeks ago before the Bar Association of Cincinnati, as a tribute to the memory of the late Senator Joseph Benson Foraker, who was for 12 years a very capable and courageous and helpful and honored Member of this body and one of the very distinguished statesmen of his time.

I should like permission to embody this very appropriate memorial in the RECORD as a mark of the Senate's approval, and thereby preserve the tribute paid to one who gave such notable service as a Member of this body.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The memorial referred to is as follows:

MEMORIAL.

Joseph Benson Foraker was born on a farm in Highland County, Ohio, July 5, 1846. His militant patriotism took him, at the age of 16, to the battle fields of the Civil War as a private soldier. His rise to the rank of captain at the age of 20 was wholly due to a personality which must even then have been unusual.

There can be no doubt that if the call to arms had not come when it did his active spirit, animating high natural abilities, would have pushed him early to distinction, but it is difficult to say what direction his career would have taken if he had entered upon it through the ordinary portals of peaceful times.

As it was, he first put on the gown of the college student when he put off his uniform, graduating at Cornell University in 1869, after taking the earlier part of his course at the Ohio Wesleyan.

He studied law with Judge James Sloan at Hillsboro, Ohio, and commenced practice in Cincinnati in 1869 as partner of Judge P. J. Donham, who was soon succeeded by L. C. Black.

The eagerness of the people to show gratitude to the defenders of the Union made certain the early entry into public life of one with the glamor of heroism about him, who had for that life both rare qualifications and strong inclinations. So we find him nominated for governor of Ohio when he was only 37 years old and commencing the first of his two successive terms in that office when he was only 39.

Five years after their expiration he was elected to the Senate of the United States, where he served two full terms.

He took a leading part in the State and National conventions of his party for almost 30 years. And always, in or out of office, he was active in the study and discussion of public affairs.

The result was a national reputation as a public man, which came early and endured throughout his life. This naturally outgrew and overshadowed his ability and standing as a lawyer, though these played no small part in winning and maintaining his high rank among the statesmen of his time.

His work and fame in these broader fields belong to the history of Ohio and the Nation. It is for the bench and bar to express and record their appreciation of his professional qualities and their esteem for his traits as a comrade in a calling which, more than any other, thoroughly tests and fully reveals the abilities and character of those who follow it.

Like that of many who came to the bar soon after the Civil War, his preparation was scanty, judged by present standards. He was conscious of this lack and worked diligently to supply it. He grasped legal principles quickly and wielded them with skill and precision. He had unusual ability to seize essential facts and make them dominant. His conclusions were reached by clear and comprehensive reasoning and always found forcible, orderly, lucid, and persuasive expression. He was eminent in all the qualities of the advocate, including firm belief in the justice of the cause he espoused.

He was by nature impetuous and high-spirited. He had the true warrior temperament. He seemed to delight in the conflicts of the forum, as he had done in battle, doubtless because he realized, consciously or unconsciously, that there he shone most brightly. Yet he was never unfair or discourteous, and his thrusts, even under provocation, did not break the rules of honorable combat.

After nine years of general practice, which took him well along the road to eminence at a bar which then ranked unusually high among the lawyers of the entire country, he was elected judge of the Superior Court of Cincinnati when only 32 years old. His associates were Judges Force and Harmon. He displayed judicial qualities which led to general regret when his service ended. But his active temperament did not take kindly to the confinement of the bench and his health became impaired, seriously as was then feared. So he resigned at the end of two years.

After his recovery and several months spent in travel and recuperation, he resumed practice with L. C. Black.

A few months later, on the recommendation of the bar, the governor tendered him an appointment as judge of the supreme court. This he felt compelled to decline.

His firm soon had a large and successful practice, which was rapidly growing when he was elected governor in 1885. After four years in that office he formed a partnership with L. C. Black and Nathaniel Rockhold, the latter being succeeded by C. A. Bosworth. He practiced alone, however, for several years, with great success, until he took his seat in the Senate, March 4, 1897.

The 12 years he served in that body were crowded with public business of the greatest importance. This related, among other things, to finance, war, regulation of industry and commerce, the acquisition and government of distant islands with inhabitants strange in race, language, and ideas, and the joining of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by a great canal. In discussion and legislation upon all these subjects he bore an active and useful part, bringing to bear, with his shining abilities, the outcome of deep study and broad research.

In 1909 he returned to his home and practice in Cincinnati. His partners at various times were Miller Outcalt, Walter L. Granger, Charles E. Prior, and his brother, James R. Foraker. His firm had an extensive business, much of it of an important character. But after several years he again practiced alone, gradually reducing his activity until of late failing health led to almost complete retirement.

He died at his home May 10, 1917.

But for these long and frequent interruptions of his professional career his industry and abilities would beyond doubt have placed him among the very few whose fame has extended beyond the ranks of the profession in which it was won. He, nevertheless, achieved a very high reputation as a lawyer.

His friendships were true and lasting, and forensic encounters, however keen, bred with him no personal animosities. To those who knew him in professional and private life he will always remain in memory a brilliant but gracious and wholesome figure, generous, sympathetic, considerate, courteous, and loyal.

BIBLE READING.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I noticed in the morning paper the following letter from the President of the United States, and will ask the indulgence of the Senate while I read it into the RECORD:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
WASHINGTON.

The Bible is the word of life. I beg that you will read it and find this out for yourselves—read, not little snatches here and there, but long passages that will really be the road to the heart of it. You will find it full of real men and women not only but also of things you have wondered about and been troubled about all your life, as men have been always; and the more you read the more it will become plain to you what things are worth while and what are not, what things make men happy—loyalty, right dealings, speaking the truth, readiness to give everything for what they think their duty, and, most of all, the wish that they may have the real approval of the Christ, who gave everything for them—and the things that are guaranteed to make men unhappy—selfishness, cowardice, greed, and everything that is low and mean. When you have read the Bible you will know that it is the Word of God, because you will have found it the key to your own heart, your own happiness, and your own duty.

WOODROW WILSON.

This, Mr. President, is a message which the President of the United States sends to the soldiers and sailors of the Army and Navy of the United States. I want to commend with all my heart these wise words of advice. I trust that the soldiers and sailors may follow the advice of the President—read the Bible with minds open and hearts ready to receive the Spirit of Christ, and that they may become imbued with the altruism of brotherly love, which characterized His holy life.

Not only would I commend this message which the President of the United States sends to these men, who are to give their lives in defense of the Nation's flag, but I trust that it may be also conveyed to the rulers of the world. The present unfortunate period of the world's history marks an epoch in the history of the Governments of the earth in which all Governments, with the possible exception of Switzerland, are controlled by rulers other than the people, whose toil produces the wealth of the country, maintains its commerce in time of peace, and sacrifice their lives in time of war. The people have not been consulted about this world war—they were not consulted when the war began, and I am afraid that their wishes will not be heeded as to the time that this war shall come to an end. But if the hearts of the rulers of the world shall be thoroughly imbued with the Spirit of Christ, this fearful war, which is an impeachment of our civilization and gives the lie to our pretended faith in the Prince of Peace, will come to an end.

May the spirit of love which illuminated and glorified the life of the Man of Galilee hasten the day when peace and good fellowship shall exist throughout the nations of the earth.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT BUILDING.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is closed.

Mr. SWANSON and Mr. SIMMONS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2477) to authorize the construction of a building for the use of the Treasury Department. This is the bill which the Senate discussed one whole day and on the passage of which the yeas and nays were ordered and taken. It will require only a roll call; there will be no discussion.

Mr. SIMMONS. Is the Senator from Virginia satisfied that the bill will not be discussed?

Mr. SWANSON. There can not be any discussion on the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. If that is the case, I shall not object.

Mr. SWANSON. A roll call is all that is required on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia moves to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2477.

Mr. POMERENE. What is the calendar number of the bill, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is calendar No. 81.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as I understand the parliamentary situation of the bill, as soon as it is before the Senate all the Senate will be called upon to do will be to vote upon the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To vote on the passage of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. The yeas and nays having been ordered and once taken developed the lack of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, before we vote upon the bill I want to move to strike out section 2.

Mr. SWANSON. It is impossible to do that, because the bill has been read the third time, and the question is on its passage.

Mr. POMERENE. I was temporarily called out of the Chamber, and had intended to make that motion before that stage was reached.

Mr. HARDWICK. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia will state it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Is it not true, under the rules of the Senate, that although a demand has been made and sustained for the yeas and nays until the roll call actually begins discussion is in order, if Senators desire to discuss the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the condition of the bill is this: The yeas and nays had been ordered and the roll was called and developed the lack of a quorum. The bill had been ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and read the third time, and the question was on the passage of the bill. The bill is therefore not now subject to amendment.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I think the Chair probably does not realize what is the effect of the adjournment without the passage of the bill on the parliamentary situation. The Senate adjourned without passing the bill. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] has again to move to take it up. When he does that, it can not return to any such parliamentary situation as claimed. I am for the bill and will support it, but I do not want any such precedent as that established.

Mr. SWANSON. I suggested that question and tried to have that contention adopted last Saturday, but the Chair decided that when the bill is taken up it is taken up exactly in the status in which it was left when last considered by the Senate.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not think that any such ruling as that should stand as the judgment of the Senate, because it is not in accordance with the rules of the Senate, in my opinion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that such a ruling was made when the motion was made to take the bill up, and will therefore hold in accordance with that ruling.

Mr. HARDWICK. If that is made as a ruling, I expect to enter an appeal, because it is not, in my opinion, the rule of the Senate and it is not the rule of any parliamentary body on earth, and I do not want any such precedent as that established in this body until the Senate understands it. If a majority think that way, they think differently from what I do.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Georgia that that has been the universal practice of the Senate ever since I have been a Member of this body.

Mr. HARDWICK. Then it has been done simply as a matter of consent.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I remember a number of cases similar to the present one where a situation developed exactly as in this case. The yeas and nays were ordered, the roll was called, and it developed that there was no quorum present; an adjournment was taken, and it was ruled at that time that after the roll call, having been begun upon the passage of a bill, there could be no amendment offered to the bill and no discussion upon the bill; and I think that ruling was right. There is nothing for the Senate to do under the rules but to vote on the bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. No.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, an adjournment of the Senate can never change the legislative position of a bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. Let me ask the Senator this question: If that is true, why does not the bill come up automatically? Suppose the motion of the Senator from Virginia were defeated this morning?

Mr. SMOOT. The bill, under the rules, can not come up automatically, Mr. President.

Mr. HARDWICK. Therefore it has not any status.

Mr. SMOOT. It comes up in its regular order the same as all other bills will do or by vote of the Senate as this bill did.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if this motion prevails, if the Senator will pardon me; when it prevails, and not till then. That is the reason why the Senator is wrong, as a matter of logic. For the one instance which the Senator thinks he remembers, I think I could recite a hundred instances in the parliamentary history of this country where the exact opposite has been held, if I had the time to get them up.

Mr. SMOOT. This has been the universal practice of the Senate, and I think an examination of the precedents will sustain my statement.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not want to see any such practice as that established, not with my consent, at least.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON].

Mr. POMERENE. Do I understand that this matter is open for discussion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the universal ruling of this body has been that it is not. This motion, however, is not debatable until 2 o'clock. The motion before the Senate is that of the Senator from Virginia to take up the bill for consideration. The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2477) to authorize the construction of a building for the use of the Treasury Department.

Mr. POMERENE. I move to amend the bill by striking out section 2.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to vote for the Senator's amendment, but I do not believe that in the present parliamentary position of this bill a motion of that kind can be entertained by the Chair.

Mr. CURTIS. I make the point of order that no discussion or amendment is in order on the bill and that the only thing in order is to call the roll.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In accordance with the precedents of this body the Chair sustains the point of order. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. HARDWICK. From that decision of the Chair I desire to enter an appeal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia appeals from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. HARDWICK. And on that appeal I wish to address the Senate.

Mr. President, it must be perfectly obvious to every Senator present that as a matter of logic, as a matter of reason, and as a matter of common sense, no such parliamentary status as has been claimed for this bill can exist in this or any other body. I challenge any Senator to point to an instance where such a procedure has been followed if the point was made and urged. I should be glad to see it. Of course, by common consent we might do that; and I want to say that, so far as this bill is concerned, I would not object to it; I have no desire to discuss it; but I am unwilling to see the Senate, unless it wants to do so after it understands the question, take any such stand as this, adopt any such precedent as this, or put itself in any such position as this.

Now, what is the contention? That some days ago during the morning hour the Senator from Virginia was in charge of this bill——

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, the Senator is mistaken. The bill was made the unfinished business and it obtained a certain status as the unfinished business, its consideration having been moved after 2 o'clock. As the unfinished business it had been amended, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read a third time. The question then was on its passage, and the yeas and nays had been ordered.

Mr. HARDWICK. Now, let me submit this to the Senator: Was it ever displaced as the unfinished business?

Mr. SWANSON. It was displaced when the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the revenue bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. That makes no difference. Of course, I would concede, because I think it would be right, if it had remained the unfinished business until this moment that there might be some merit in the contention; but the proposal that a bill, even if it is the unfinished business, can be brought up in this body during the morning hour and the roll can be called on it, and because the roll call discloses the absence of a quorum, and it is necessary to adjourn without passing the bill——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I rise to make a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. SMOOT. Rule XX, under the heading "Questions of order," states:

> When an appeal is taken, any subsequent question of order which may arise before the decision of such appeal shall be decided by the Presiding Officer without debate; and every appeal therefrom shall be decided at once, and without debate.

Mr. HARDWICK. That does not refer to this question, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT. I think so.

Mr. HARDWICK. No.

Mr. SMOOT. In other words, Mr. President, an appeal from a decision of the Chair is to be decided by the Senate without debate.

Mr. HARDWICK. The rule authorizes debatable an appeal from the decision of the Chair, Mr. President, and is a novel proposition to assert in any parliamentary body that an appeal from a decision of the Chair can not be debated. The Rules of the Senate expressly provide otherwise.

Mr. SMOOT. I refer to Rule XX, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. HARDWICK. Very well. Even that rule provides otherwise when it is carefully read.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I make the point of order that no debate on the appeal or anything else is now in order. The only thing in order is the continuance of the call of the roll, which has once been begun, as I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has so decided.

Mr. LODGE. I so understand; but if appeals can be taken and debated the ruling is worthless.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Rules of the Senate provide that appeals from decisions of the Chair may be debated. Senators will not gain anything as to any bill by any such course as they are undertaking to pursue.

Mr. SMOOT. I am only endeavoring to observe the rules.

Mr. HARDWICK. I want to observe the rules; but certainly the Senate has a right to decide whether or not a decision is correct, and Senators have a right, as old as this body itself, to be heard on that question. The rule is clear, and the practice of the Senate has been uniform with respect to that matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that as another point of order has been made, that had better be disposed of, so that we may proceed in regular order.

Mr. HARDWICK. The point of order pending now is whether or not the appeal is debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah made a point of order which the Chair can not sustain, and overrules. As to the point of order made by the Senator from Georgia, so far as Rule XXVIII is concerned, the appeal is certainly debatable in the judgment of the Chair.

Mr. HARDWICK. I thought so; and I did not think anybody thought otherwise, except the Senator from Utah and possibly the Senator from Massachusetts; and the opinion of either one of them is of little concern to me on this question.

This is the proposition: The Senate had this bill under consideration. It is true at that time it was the unfinished business of the Senate, but since then it has been displaced as the unfinished business, and whatever privilege or special status it had as such has been lost and destroyed. The roll is called; the roll call discloses the absence of a quorum, and the Senate adjourns without acting on the proposition one way or the other; it is left up in the air; it can only be taken up again and given renewed vitality by other and affirmative action of the Senate. Yet Senators are here insisting that the Senate when it takes that action gives life to a thing that is dead and renews a thing that it has destroyed for the moment and can only take it on condition that the question is not open to debate and not open to amendment. I challenge any Senator of the United States to cite any precedent that sustains such a monstrous proposition as that. On principle it seems to me utterly absurd.

Are we to vote for or against a motion proposed by the Senator from Virginia with the foreknowledge that all we can do if we adopt his motion is either to pass or defeat his bill, with every "i" dotted just as it is and with every "t" crossed just as it is? Is the Senate to be bound and gagged, without either the right of discussion or amendment? I think not. It is utterly unreasonable; it is utterly unsound; and, with all deference to some of my friends who think they remember, out of the plenitude of long service in this body, precedents otherwise, I should like to see those precedents produced and let us see just what they are, and what they held, and where they are, because such a contention is so utterly contrary to reason; it is so utterly contrary to practice in the other House of Congress; it is so utterly contrary to all parliamentary theories that it seems to me to be a manifest absurdity. If that were true, all a Senator would have to do who did not care to risk having his bill amended in the Senate would be to get it up some time when there was a slim attendance and get a roll call on it, and then have an adjournment and force the bill, without the possibility of either amendment or discussion in the Senate, to be taken up and adopted either as it is or not at all. That is not the object of the Senate; it is not the object of parliamentary procedure; and we ought not to adopt any such rule or any such practice or to put ourselves in any such position as that.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia uses rather strong language and speaks of the absurdity of the present parliamentary situation; but it seems to me the absurdity is on the side of his contention. Let me state this case. The Senate considered this bill for nearly a day; it considered it, as in Committee of the Whole, as the unfinished business. While being considered as in Committee of the Whole amendments were offered and discussed and voted upon. After the bill had been considered as in Committee of the Whole it was reported to the Senate, where it was again discussed under the rules of the Senate, and, after voting on amendments, it was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and the question came on its passage. These stages had been gone through by the Senate after nearly a day's discussion and argument. All that had been done, and the rule is clear that after a bill has been ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and read the third time it can not afterwards be amended, unless that action is reconsidered. That status has been reached in the consideration of this bill; that was the action of the Senate. There must be some conclusion of action in every parliamentary body, or else it never would conclude anything. After the Senate has acted there is but one way its action can be nullified, and that is by a reconsideration.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. How could the Senate act with less than a quorum present and with that point appearing of record?

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, there was a quorum during the consideration of the amendments; there was a quorum which voted to report the bill from the Committee of the Whole to the Senate; there had to be a quorum on the vote to have the bill engrossed for a third reading and read the third time; and the record shows that on several votes a quorum was present. Now the Senator comes in here and says, after the Senate has acted, after it has discussed a measure, after it has been reported out of the Committee of the Whole to the Senate, after it has been ordered engrossed for a third reading and read the third time, that that amounts to nothing. The rule is clear——

Mr. FLETCHER. May I interrupt the Senator to refer to a precedent?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. The precedent seems to sustain the contention of the Senator from Virginia and the ruling of the Chair up to this time. On page 28 of Gilfry's Precedents, paragraph 18, there appears the following:

On motion by Mr. Hale,

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill (S. 2263) to require the employment of vessels of the United States for public purposes; and the reported amendment having been agreed to, and the bill further amended on the motion of Mr. McCUMBER, and the motion of Mr. Allison.

A further amendment having been proposed by Mr. Daniel,

After debate, on motion by Mr. Carmack to recommit the bill to the Committee on Commerce, the yeas were 12 and the nays were 30.

On motion by Mr. Teller,

The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

* * * * * * *

The number of Senators voting not constituting a quorum, the Presiding Officer (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair), directed the roll to be called, when 48 Senators answered to their names.

A quorum being present, on motion by Mr. Hale,

Ordered, That the bill as amended be reprinted.

On motion by Mr. Hale, at 4 o'clock and 17 minutes p. m. the Senate adjourned.

On the following day February 27, on motion by Mr. Hale, the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill S. 2263.

The question being on the motion of Mr. Carmack to recommit the bill to the Committee on Commerce, the President pro tempore (Mr. Frye) held that the roll call should be immediately resumed without debate or other intervening business.

The roll was called, and the question was determined.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, the Constitution provides that when one-fifth of the Members request a yea-and-nay vote on a question it must be had. One-fifth of the Members of the Senate ordered a yea-and-nay vote at the stage when this bill was on its passage some days ago. I thought possibly I could get rid of that situation by securing unanimous consent, and I wanted to ask unanimous consent to dispense with the yea-and-nay vote on the measure; but after looking into the question and consulting others, it became apparent that it was impossible, even by unanimous consent, to get rid of the constitutional provision requiring the roll to be called after it had once been ordered.

There is another rule——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. SWANSON. I will yield in a minute. There is another rule which says that when the first name on the roll has been called and answer made, nothing else can be done but to continue the calling of the roll. On the question of the passage of this bill the roll had been called.

Mr. HARDWICK. The requirement as to calling the roll does not extend from day to day.

Mr. SWANSON. That is the requirement whenever the question comes up for consideration. I brought this question up on last Saturday, when the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] was in the chair, and he ruled as I have indicated. I knew at that time there was no quorum present, and I was very anxious to get the measure in such a position that it could be discussed and argued and amendments offered; but what is the reason of the ruling? It is because when a bill comes up for consideration it is in exactly the status that the Senate has put it. The Senate put this bill in the status of being out of the Committee of the Whole, in the Senate, engrossed and read a third time, and ordered the yeas and nays on it; and, as I understand, when it again comes up for consideration, if it is ever considered again, it comes up precisely in the status that the Senate had decided it should occupy.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. SWANSON. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I hesitate to express any opinion after the severity with which the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] has spoken of my opinion on parliamentary law. We can not take up a bill at any other stage except that at which we left it. Nothing is better settled than that; and if you take it up at the stage where the roll was being called, in my judgment—and precedents in the House and Senate will be found to sustain it—nothing can interfere with the calling of the roll when that has once been begun, no matter whether a day or a month has intervened. There is a precedent of the House, which the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] has, where there was an interval of months.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SWANSON. I do.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] claims that there has been no precedent for this decision. It has been the universal practice in the Senate to hold as the Chair held the other day and as the Chair has held to-day; and I find, in looking over the precedents of the House, two decisions in point on this question. They are very short, and I should like to read them, if I may.

When a yea-and-nay vote on a bill fails for lack of a quorum, the order for the yeas and nays remains effective whenever the bill again comes before the House. On May 10, 1886, a District of Columbia day, the House was considering the bill (H. R. 7083) to incorporate the trustees of the Young Women's Christian Home, in Washington, D. C., and on the passage, the yeas and nays having been ordered, there were 145 yeas, 1 nay; no quorum.

The House then adjourned.

On June 14, 1886, District of Columbia business being again in order, Mr. John S. Barbour, of Virginia, called the bill up again, and a proposition for debate was made.

The Speaker said:

The yeas and nays were ordered on the passage of the bill, and they were taken, but no quorum appeared. If the yeas and nays are dispensed with, it must be by unanimous consent.

Again:

On August 28, 1890, the Speaker stated the pending question to be on the appeal of Mr. WILLIAM E. MASON, of Illinois, from the decision of the Chair, made on the 26th instant, that the bill of the House (H. R. 11568) defining lard, also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture and sale, importation, and exportation of compound lard, was the pending business before the House, on which appeal the yeas and nays had been ordered, and on which no quorum voted.

Mr. Benjamin A. Enloe, of Tennessee, made the point of order that this day having been assigned to the Committee on Labor, the bill named should go over as unfinished business until to-morrow or Monday, or such subsequent time as unfinished business might be properly considered.

The Speaker declined to entertain the point of order on the ground that the question raised was the one pending—

And ordered the roll to be called.

I hope the ruling of the Chair will be sustained.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I want to say a word, perhaps not so much either for or against the point of order that has been raised as on the merits of this particular bill.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I make the point of order that debate is out of order. I should like to reply, but unless there is to be general discussion I must insist upon the point of order.

Mr. POMERENE. Very well. I am going to find out whether the usual latitude of debate is going to be allowed here or not.

Mr. LODGE. Not at this stage.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to reply to the Senator, but I insist that the rule says that when the yeas and nays are ordered nothing else is in order. I insist that the roll shall be called.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have been perfectly frank in stating my position about this matter, and I do not, by means of any subterfuge, pretend to discuss a point of order when I have something else in mind. I want that distinctly understood; but I know what latitude has been given to debate in these particular matters, and I propose to discuss the merits of this bill for about one minute, if I may be permitted to do so. If not, I will submit to any ruling the Chair may make; but that is what I intend to do.

Mr. SWANSON. I raise the point of order that discussion on the merits of the bill is not in order. Unless I can have the same privilege, I make the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order, being raised, must be decided without debate.

The Chair decides that debate on the bill generally is not now in order. The Chair can not, however, control the action of any Senator in making statements in regard to anything. If a question which is debatable is before the Senate, the Chair can not be responsible for what a Senator says.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I understood that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] made the point of order that no appeal could be taken from the ruling of the Chair, and that nothing was in order pending the roll call, but proceeding with the roll call. I did not hear when there was any ruling.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That point of order the Chair overruled.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I will yield the floor in view of what the President has stated; but immediately after this vote is taken I shall have an observation to make with regard to the employment of extra architects when they are not necessary. I do not believe we are in a position where we want to go to that extraordinary expense at this particular time.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, just a moment.

A few seconds ago I felt just a little hurt at some of the points of order that were being made, and used some language that I rather regret. I have the utmost respect for the opinions of both the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Utah, not only on questions of parliamentary law but on all questions, and I exceedingly regret the use of any language that indicated anything to the contrary. Those Senators, of course, understand that. It was in the heat of debate; and yet I do think it is going a good way for Senators of the experience and standing of these two Senators to insist that I did not have the right to debate this appeal when the express rule of the Senate, as uniformly construed by the Senate, is exactly to the contrary.

That is neither here nor there, however. I am willing to admit whatever I think is the truth about a matter, and I do think that the Senators have done something I did not believe was possible. They have submitted some precedents to show that the ruling of the Chair is correct. I do not believe it is sound in principle, for the reasons I gave the Senate. I will venture to say that for the two precedents cited by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] as to the House practice, I can cite twenty times that many on the other side of the question. I know the House rulings have not always been uniform. I say that with some hesitancy, though, because I did not think the Senator could find one precedent that way in all the parliamentary history of this country.

As far as the opinion of Senator Hale was concerned, it is true that it was acquiesced in by the Senate; but, as I said a moment ago, I think that was done as a matter of common consent more than anything else, and without any argument of the real merits of the question. Still, until I can fortify my position with authority that I can not find on the spur of the moment, I have no hope of sustaining the appeal; and as I am not willing to have it expressly decided by the Senate, after a contest, until I am prepared to submit authorities in support of the position, I think I shall withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The appeal from the decision of the Chair is withdrawn. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], who is absent. I transfer that pair to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "yea."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] and vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], who is absent. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "yea."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (when Mr. SAULSBURY's name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] to the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when Mr. WALSH's name was called). My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the affirmative). I observe that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], with whom I have a general pair, has not voted; but as I am informed that if present he would vote as I have done I will let my vote stand.

Mr. KENDRICK. I have a pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. I do not know how he would vote on this question. I transfer my pair with him to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], on account of illness. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. KIRBY. I announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. ROBINSON] and ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. KING. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] is detained on official business.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON];

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN];

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT]; and

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON].

The result was announced—yeas 45, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—45.

Ashurst	Hollis	Nelson	Sherman
Bankhead	Husting	Overman	Shields

So the bill was passed.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I desire to explain my vote on the bill just passed.

When this matter was up before I had indicated to a number of Senators my intention to move to amend the bill by striking out the second section, which provides for the employment of special architects to have charge of this work. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] at the time was occupying the floor. It was thought that the debate would continue for some time, and I momentarily stepped out of the Chamber. Meanwhile he yielded the floor and the bill was passed from the Committee of the Whole and reported to the Senate, and when I returned a vote was being taken on the final passage of the bill.

I voted against the bill because I think it very unwise at this time when the Government has a Supervising Architect and a corps of assistants whose time could be devoted to structures of this kind, to allow them to devote themselves to the building perhaps of small post offices throughout the land when their time could be devoted just as well to this particular structure. I think it was very unwise to provide for the employment of special architects on this work, and I beg to indulge the hope that when the bill comes before the other House they will strike out section 2, which authorizes their employment.

WAR REVENUE.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, House bill 4280.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes.

Mr. WEEKS. I submit two amendments to the pending bill. I ask that they be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I intend to propose to the pending bill. I shall not ask to have the amendment read now, but I desire that it shall be printed, and printed in the RECORD, and also that it lie upon the table after having been printed in order that I may call it up at the proper time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

Amend by striking out all of the last paragraph of section 200, from line 1 to line 8, inclusive, on page 12; also strike out sections 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, and 206 and insert in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 201. That in addition to the taxes under existing laws there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of every corporation and partnership organized, authorized, or existing under the laws of the United States, or any State, Territory, or District thereof, no matter how created or organized, excepting income derived from the business of life, health, and accident insurance combined in one policy issued on the weekly premium payment plan, a tax on the amount by which such net income exceeds the sum of (a) $5,000 and (b) 8 per cent of the actual capital invested, as follows:

"In excess of $10,000,000, 50 per cent.

"Every foreign corporation and partnership, including corporations and partnerships of the Philippine Islands and Porto Rico, shall pay for each taxable year a like tax upon the amount by which its net income received from all sources within the United States exceeds the sum of (a) 8 per cent of the actual capital invested and used or employed in the business in the United States, and (b) that proportion of $5,000 which the entire actual capital invested and used or employed in the business in the United States bears to the entire actual capital invested; and in case no such capital is used or employed in the business in the United States the tax shall be imposed upon that portion of such net income which is in excess of the sum of (a) 8 per cent of that proportion of the entire actual capital invested and used or employed in the business which the net income from sources within the United States bears to the entire net income and (b) that proportion of $5,000 which the net income from sources within the United States bears to the entire net income.

"SEC. 202. That for the purpose of this title, actual capital invested means (1) actual cash paid in, (2) the actual cash value, at the time of payment, of assets other than cash paid in, and (3) paid in or earned surplus and undivided profits used or employed in the business; but does not include money or other property borrowed by the corporation or partnership.

"SEC. 203. That the tax herein imposed upon corporations and partnerships shall be computed upon the basis of the net income shown by their income tax returns under Title I of the act entitled 'An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes,' approved September 8, 1916, or under this title, and shall be assessed and collected at the same time and in the same manner as the income tax due under Title I of such act of September 8, 1916: Provided, That for the purpose of this title a partnership shall have the same privilege with reference to fixing its fiscal year as is accorded corporations under section 13 (a) of Title I of such act of September 8, 1916: And provided further, That where a corporation or partnership makes return prior to March 1, 1918, covering its own fiscal year and includes therein any income received during the calendar year ending December 31, 1916, the tax herein imposed shall be that proportion of the tax based upon such full fiscal year which the time from January 1, 1917, to the end of such fiscal year bears to the full fiscal year.

"SEC. 204. That corporations exempt from tax under the provisions of section 11 of Title I of the act approved September 8, 1916, and partnerships carrying on or doing the same business shall be exempt from the provisions of this title, and the tax imposed by this title shall not attach to incomes of partnerships derived from agriculture or from personal services.

"SEC. 205. That every corporation having a net income of $5,000 or more for the taxable year making a return under Title I of such act of September 8, 1916, shall for the purposes of this title include in such return a detailed statement of the actual capital invested.

"Every partnership having a net income of $5,000 or more for the taxable year shall render a correct return of the income of the partnership for the taxable year, setting forth specifically the actual capital invested and the gross income for such year and the deductions hereinafter allowed. Such returns shall be rendered at the same time and in the same manner and form as is prescribed for income-tax returns under Title I of such act of September 8, 1916. In computing net income of a partnership for the purposes of this title there shall be allowed like deductions as are allowed to individuals in sections 5 (a) and 6 (a) of such act of September 8, 1916.

"SEC. 206. That all administrative, special, and general provisions of law, including the laws in relation to the assessment, remission, collection, and refund of internal-revenue taxes not heretofore specifically repealed and not inconsistent with the provisions of this title are hereby extended and made applicable to all the provisions of this title and to the tax herein imposed, and all provisions of Title I of such act of September 8, 1916, relating to returns and payment of the tax therein imposed, including penalties, are hereby made applicable to the tax required by this title.

"SEC. 207. That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall make all necessary regulations for carrying out the provisions of this title, and may require any corporation or partnership subject to the provisions of this title to furnish him with such facts, data, and information as in his judgment are necessary to collect the tax provided for in this title."

Mr. BANKHEAD addressed the Senate. After having spoken for some time, he said:

Mr. President, I have not concluded what I intended to say. At a later time I shall resume the remarks that I intend to make before this question is disposed of.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, I do not think there is any more important work that Congress has to deal with at this session than the revenue bill. The successful termination of this great war is bound to depend largely on the countries that have the greatest financial resources. How we meet the present situation—how we are able to manage our financial resources and our policy of taxation and raising revenue—is going to be very material in the ultimate result. This is proven by all history.

It really was the economic conditions at the end of the Napoleonic wars that caused the defeat of France. It was Napoleon's continental system that finally was overcome by the English blockade and which defeated him.

The Committee on Finance has thoroughly realized this condition. For 10 weeks we have been at work on the bill. We have considered it from all angles, and we have brought in a bill that we believe is sound and just, and one that will raise the proper revenue on the most advantageous principles.

Mr. President, the theory upon which this bill is based has been more or less of a new departure in taxation. We have imposed the bulk of the taxation on incomes and on excess profits. We have done that because we believe that they were best able to pay. We have considered that the man who was best able to pay the tax and feel it least was the man that should properly bear the burden; and on this theory we have placed more than three-fifths of the total taxes on incomes and excess profits. The income tax, it is estimated, will amount to $777,700,000; the war-profits tax will amount to $562,000,000, making a total of taxes on excess profits and incomes of something over $1,300,000,000. If you add to that the taxes on spirits, fermented liquors, and wines, amounting to $207,000,000, and the $11,000,000 tax on soft drinks, you will find that a very small proportion of the revenue is derived from general taxation.

Mr. President, I believe that that is a sound principle. I believe that it is a principle that is going to be followed in the future, and one that has been followed by our allies across the seas. The question to be considered is so to place our taxation that we will not only raise a great amount of revenue but that we will not hamper business, but, rather, allow it to go on and improve, and then we shall get more and more revenue. In doing that we will aid workingmen, industry, and at the same time assist the Government as well as our allies, for to-day America is practically the banker of the allied world, the country to which all the other powers are now coming, after three years of terrific warfare and financial strain. We have vast resources, greatly augmented by the last three years of prosperity, and these great resources are now going to be used to carry on the war.

The history of other countries shows that the great expenditures caused by the war will necessarily increase the volume of business. There is bound to be a vast amount of capital put into business so as to increase it; and as that business increases, under the plan that we now have on hand our taxes will increase. There is going to be a heavy demand in this country for money. It will be necessary to sell a large quantity of bonds. It is impossible to finance a war of this magnitude on taxes alone. We are compelled to raise a large proportion of the money by a bond issue, just as in big private enterprises one has to borrow money in order to float them.

Naturally this demand is likely to create a stringency in the money market. It is likely to make the rates of interest go up unless we deal with it wisely. If we put our war-profits tax too high the corporations and the individuals who are engaged in business will not have proper opportunity of increasing that business. They will have to borrow more money, and the probabilities are that business will not go forward the way it should; and while we may get more revenue the first year of the tax, we will get less in the end.

Mr. President, in putting our tax on the incomes of individuals we have tried to put it on those that are best able to pay. The able Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] showed yesterday that over $106,000,000 would be raised on incomes of over $500,000. We have put the high surtaxes on incomes above $15,000. From there up a cursory examination of the bill shows that the taxes are continually increased on a greater and greater scale, until finally we reach 33 per cent surtax in addition to the 4 per cent normal tax.

Mr. President, I think the provisions of the income tax are well understood. That question has been thrashed out in Congress ever since 1913, when the first income-tax law was passed. I think the men of wealth are willing to pay their share. In fact, I think they are acting in a patriotic manner. I know that in my State, which is a large industrial State with much wealth, I have not received one protest against the income tax. Every right-minded citizen feels that he has to do his share and is only too willing to give his money when so many men will have to give their lives.

The next item of the bill which will raise an enormous revenue and which is open to much more discussion because of its novelty is the war excess profits tax. I find from my constituents who write to me that many do not understand the provisions of the bill as it is now before the Senate. This excess profits tax is estimated to yield the Government $562,000,000 in revenue. It is based on the theory that the corporation, the copartnership, or the individual that has received largely increased profits because of the war should pay a higher proportion of the tax than the corporation, individual, or copartnership that has not so benefited. Of course this is a fundamental proposition. Whether you believe in that theory or not is another question.

The House proposed last year, and it is now the law, that a tax of 8 per cent should be imposed on profits over 8 per cent; and then this year they amended that statute by doubling the tax, making it 16 per cent. Of course that would impose a tax on all corporations, irrespective of any advantage they have received from this war, and it also imposes a flat-rate tax. In other words, the corporation that receives 9 per cent pays 16 per cent, and the corporation that is making 25 per cent pays 16 per cent.

This does not conform to the surtax theory of the income tax, and I do not believe that it is sound taxation.

But even leaving that question aside, there is a greater difficulty to be met in the House measure, and that is the impracticability of its enforcement. Under the House proviso they have tried to define what was capital. They have tried to eliminate certain values that are very often used in an endeavor to water stock. They have stricken out trade-marks, good will, and other things of that sort.

But, Mr. President, I do not believe that you can define, even according to the proviso of the House bill, what the capital of all the corporations in the United States is, and that is what is attempted to be done. It may be said that this is the law now. It is, and possibly workable to a certain extent when the tax is not greater than 8 per cent, but as soon as you increase that tax, as soon as you begin to double up your tax, there is an added greater and greater incentive for evasion through improper capitalization.

It is a well-known fact that after the bill passed the House a great many large corporations throughout the country immediately took under consideration the question of recapitalization. That would be a very simple matter to do, especially if a corporation was a successful one. Stock that possibly had been originally selling at par which had increased eight times, so it was now selling at eight hundred, could easily be turned back to the corporation and new stock given out to replace it, and in that way an actual increase of the capitalization of the corporation be made. That is only one example of what could be done and, in my opinion, of what would be done.

The result would be, Mr. President, that under the House bill there would be continual evasions. There would be all sorts of bookkeeping schemes by people who were not patriotic but led on by self-interest, and there would also be, in many cases, an honest difference of opinion as to what should be considered as capital and what not. It would seem to me under the House provision there would be endless delay in collecting the tax, endless causes of action, endless disruption of business conditions, and really a falling down in the Government plan of taxation.

Now, your committee, in considering this matter, decided that it was not good business policy to rely on such a principle of taxation, and that the only practical thing to do was to try and arrive at a basis where the excess profits could be collected without having to determine the capital stock of practically every corporation in the United States. They took the income return of corporations that have been made to the Treasury since 1909, and then determined that the prewar period should be the years 1911, 1912, and 1913, in other words, the years just before the war. We could not go very much further back of that time because the Treasury Department has no record of corporation returns before 1909, when the first corporation-tax act was passed.

With that as the basis, we say that where a corporation has been making a certain average during those three years it can deduct that from what it makes in the year 1917, and the remainder shall be taxed on a graded principle—12 per cent on the first, 15 per cent, then 16 per sent, and so on, to the scale of 50 per cent where the profit exceeds 250 per cent.

Mr. LEWIS. Will it interrupt the Senator from Rhode Island for me, knowing as I do the amount of industry the Senator has given to this bill in its preparation, as he is a member of the committee, and particularly as to him has been committed much of the labor in connection with the excess profits tax and the income tax—much of the bill shows his work in that respect—I wish to ask the Senator, can the Senator tell me, without taking too much time away and diverting him from his interesting argument, what difference there is, or the difference, between the House bill and the Senate committee bill as to what we call franchises and good will, as to how far franchise and good will are treated as capital for the purpose of reaching the calculation of profit?

Mr. GERRY. Yes; I will do so.

Mr. LEWIS. I should be very glad to have the Senator's view. It will interest me very much.

Mr. GERRY. I will say to the Senator from Illinois that under the House bill they define actual capital invested as follows:

SEC. 202. That for the purpose of this title, actual capital invested means (1) actual cash paid in, (2) the actual cash value of property paid in other than cash, for stock or shares in such corporation or partnership, at the time of such payment, and (3) paid in or earned surplus and undivided profits used or employed in the business: Provided, That the good will, including trade-marks and trade brands, or the franchise of a corporation or partnership, is not to be included in the actual capital invested, unless the corporation or partnership made payment therefor specifically as such in cash or tangible property, the value of such good will, trade-marks, trade brands, or franchise, not to exceed the actual cash or actual value of the tangible property paid therefor at the time of such payment.

I will say to the Senator from Illinois that the House tried to define, as I just said before, what capital is, and refuses to allow franchises and good will as capital unless it was paid for in actual cash or tangible property. We have not defined what is capital in the Senate committee bill. We have tried as much as possible to get away from that. There are one or two cases of which I will speak afterwards where we have to use the word "capital," but we have not defined it at all. We have based our tax on the difference of the income of the corporation in the prewar period and the taxable year, and we get that income from the returns made to the Treasury Department. Just to avoid this difficulty is one reason why the Committee on Finance adopted the program we are now pursuing.

Now, Mr. President, while the excess profits of normal corporations are determined as every other private interest. There are certain corporations that it was necessary to make exceptions for, where the capital used in the business is different from the average capital of the prewar period. In other words, if a corporation has increased or decreased the amount of its capital since the prewar period, then the average net income of the prewar period for the purpose of ascertaining the excess profits is assumed to be increased or decreased in the same proportion. In that case we have to consider capital, but we can accept the corporations' statement as to their capital before the war, and on that basis consider the average of the increase or the decrease. We would not have to go into a very detailed consideration of what the capital of the corporation was.

Where the average of the net income of a concern for the prewar period was below a normal return upon its investment the Secretary of the Treasury has the right to find, if such is the case, and if he does find that the ratio between the net and the gross income is such that the business was substantially less than the like ratio in the case of representative trades or business, the war profits of such trades or business shall be determined as in the case of a new corporation.

A new corporation or an individual who was not in the business during the prewar period is allowed to take the same average as similar trades or business. In other words, if other corporations engaged in similar trades or business have been earning a stated average it is allowed to deduct that from the amount of its earnings for the taxable year, and if it is also found that it has not earned 6 per cent in the taxable year then it is exempt from the tax.

Mr. President, the practical working out of this tax shows that corporations like United States Steel, which would pay only $21,685,000 under the House bill, will pay $76,726,471 under the Senate committee bill; that the Bethlehem Steel Corporation would pay under the House bill $7,125,000 and under this bill $25,045,090; that the Anaconda Copper Mining Co. would pay under the House proviso $5,817,000 and under the Senate committee bill $14,512,497. The B. F. Goodrich Co. would pay $203,000 under the House bill and $1,635,633 under the Senate committee bill. The Pennsylvania Railroad would pay no tax under the House bill and would pay $1,699,654 under this measure. The E. I. Du Pont de Nemours Co. would pay $11,240,000 under the House bill and $35,922,989 under the Senate Finance Committee bill. Under the House provision a very small proportion of the railroads would pay a tax. Under the Senate bill they will pay a fair proportion of the taxes of the country.

I forgot to state that there is a further exemption. A corporation having made less than $5,000 would pay no tax; neither would partnerships nor individuals.

The very learned and able Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] called the committee's attention to the fact that while copartnerships and individuals had to pay on their surplus, whether employed in their business or not, corporations did not. He raised the question of the inequality of this and showed that a great amount of surplus was going untaxed. The committee realized the justice of the Senator's claim and tried in some way to remedy the inequality. But it was a very difficult thing to do, because in the case of the individual you tax him whether or not he keeps his surplus; but in the case of the corporation, it is only practical to tax the surplus if it is not expended. That raised the question as to whether it was sound business policy to put a punitive tax on the retention of a surplus.

The committee finally decided that they would try and remedy this inequality by raising the corporation tax so that the corporations will pay a normal tax of 6 per cent and the individual pay a normal tax of 4 per cent. So the corporation has a disadvantage of 2 per cent as against the individual, and in this way there is some slight equalization. This additional 2 per cent corporation tax brings in, I think, something like $150,000,000 to the Treasury of the United States.

The committee, though, realizing that great surpluses might be retained in order to avoid taxation in the future, retained with the idea that when these war taxes were repealed their surplus could be distributed, and feeling also that here was a source of additional revenue, placed a tax of 10 per cent on all surplus that was not retained to be used in the business or could not reasonably be held on the basis of sound business policy for future contingencies.

It also gave the Secretary of the Treasury power to investigate any corporation that retained a very great surplus and to determine whether the amount retained was greater than allowed by these exemptions, and if he determined that this surplus was improperly held, then a tax of 15 per cent was placed upon that surplus.

Mr. President, probably those great corporations would be able to pay a tax of 10 per cent on surplus whether they retained it for their business or not, and it undoubtedly would bring in revenue to the Government, but I doubt if that would be sound business policy for smaller corporations in which there are a few stockholders, whose main income comes from such corporations and who would be tempted to distribute their surplus unless they had a definite object in view for it. They would be liable to run their business on too close a margin, and I believe that would impair the industrial activity of the country, for it has always been observed in the past, even before these war taxes were considered, that sound business corporations retain a fairly large surplus. The corporation that neglected to do this was on the downward path and was liable to failure.

If it is said that we are not taxing enough the corporations that were receiving large income during the prewar period, it will be perfectly simple in the future to raise the normal tax, if that is considered wise.

There is no question in my mind but that as the war goes on and greater and greater demands are made on the Government, we shall have to increase our war-profits tax. England started with an excess profits tax, the maximum of which was 50 per cent, and has now gone to 80 per cent. Our maximum war-profits tax is 50 per cent, and I believe that by starting at that amount we will allow the corporations to expand their business, to comply with the demands that will be continually made upon them, and that as they expand their business they will naturally increase their profits, and, as I said before, we shall receive greater and greater revenue, and the working people of our country will be enjoying more and more prosperity. By waiting now we will be able to obtain a very much larger total amount than we would if we placed the excess-profit tax at, say, 80 per cent at once.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I wish to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. GERRY. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. BROUSSARD. The Senator informs the Senate that the British war tax started with a maximum of 50 per cent and has been increased to 80 per cent. I should like to know what was the basis of the tax and in what way the excess war profits were calculated in that country upon which the tax was imposed?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. GERRY. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. If I understand the inquiry of the Senator from Louisiana, it is, What is the basis upon which the English ascertained the normal profits for the purpose of exemption?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. SIMMONS. It was upon the basis of three years—the average profits of three years—the taxpayer being permitted to select any two of those three years.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I understood that there was a system of selection.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the German system. They make the earnings of five years the basis, but they require that the highest year and the lowest year——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order, and that is that none of us on this side of the Chamber can hear what is going on in this colloquy. But assuming that it is very interesting, I think we ought to have a few more Senators to listen to it. I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of New Mexico in the chair). The Senator from North Dakota suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Harding	McKellar	Sheppard
Borah	Hardwick	McNary	Simmons
Brady	Husting	Nelson	Smoot
Brandegee	Jones, N. Mex.	New	Sterling
Broussard	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Sutherland
Calder	Kellogg	Page	Thompson
Culberson	Kendrick	Phelan	Trammell
Curtis	King	Pittman	Underwood
Dillingham	Kirby	Poindexter	Vardaman
France	Knox	Pomerene	Wadsworth
Gerry	La Follette	Ransdell	Weeks
Gore	Lodge	Saulsbury	Williams
Gronna	McCumber	Shafroth

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of sickness and to state that he is paired with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. I shall let this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Rhode Island yield for a question?

Mr. GERRY. With pleasure.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I understand the Senator to say that the method of determining the profit on which this tax is to be imposed is different from both the German and the British system of ascertaining the same fact?

Mr. GERRY. It is.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Will the Senator explain the reason why the committee has seen fit to discard both the German and the British method and to adopt an entirely new method in fixing the sum of money upon which the tax is to be imposed?

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, the reason the committee adopted this new method was because they found, after a careful analysis of the figures, that it was fairer than the English method, under which the average of two out of three years is taken; and fairer than the German method, under which five years are considered and the high and the low are exempt. It was found that our method of taking the average of three years was really a fairer method. That was the opinion of the experts and the committee.

Mr. President, in addition to the enormous revenue that we are proposing to raise on incomes and war profits, amounting to one billion and over three hundred million dollars, we propose to raise a revenue of $207,000,000 from spirits, fermented liquors and wines, $56,000,000 from tobacco, and $11,000,000 from soft drinks, making a total of something like $1,600,000,000.

We believed that these taxes would be the least burdensome to the people who are least able to bear taxation; we felt that they were fair and that the basis of our bill was sound. To raise additional revenue it was decided that we would tax as much as possible luxuries and not the necessities of life. Mineral waters, sirups, extracts for soda fountains, unfermented grape juice, soft drinks of all kinds, and carbonic-acid gas were all articles that could be properly taxed, because they were not necessities.

The House had proposed to tax the sale of automobiles. A gross tax of that sort is always dangerous, because a gross-sales tax may be really a great deal higher than it seems on its face. It was found that, although there was a large amount of money made by certain automobile manufacturers, nearly 80 per cent of the automobile concerns were not working on a large percentage of profit, and that the gross-sales tax included in the House bill would work a great hardship to those least able to bear it. So we placed a graded tax on automobiles according to their value. We provided that the indiviual who owned an automobile not greater than $500 in value should pay $5, and if over $500 and not over $750 that he should pay $7.50, and so on up on a graded scale.

The House bill based the yacht tax on the cost price, but it seemed wise to your committee that the tax on yachts should be so adjusted that in the future it would work to the advantage of the Navy. We have therefore placed a tax on yachts based on the over-all measurement, so that the larger the yacht the larger the amount of tax to be paid, unless the yacht is in the service of the United States Government, or unless it is built according to certain plans and specifications of the Navy Department, in which event it is exempt from the tax. This war has shown the great need of yachts and other pleasure vessels which may be used in the protection of our coast and in submarine warfare and makes such an exemption advisable. They have proven a very valuable adjunct to our defense. When you take a yacht and put it into the Navy you are not removing from the commerce of the United States one of its carriers, while that is what you are doing where a merchantman is commandeered.

We also placed a gross tax on sporting goods, on perfumes, on cameras, and articles of that sort that were not necessities, and which we felt were able to bear the tax. We imposed a low tax, because, as I have already stated, gross-sales taxes are always dangerous, and, as a matter of fact, some of the House gross-sales taxes, I believe, would have worked havoc to our industries.

I had a letter to-day from a constituent who spoke of the tax that was laid on the jewelry industry, which is a very large industry in my State and one that employs a great number of men. Under this gross-sales tax I feel satisfied that great injustice would have been done to that industry and to the men who are engaged in it. If the industry is making a great deal of money it will pay the excess-profits tax, whatever the corporation or whoever the individual may be, and in that way I feel that we have met the situation in a very much wiser way than by imposing a tax on gross receipts.

We also struck out the tax on light and heat. I believe, Mr. President, that this tax would have borne more heavily on the poor of the land than nearly any other tax in the bill. I do not believe it was wise to impose it. I can not believe that it had been given proper consideration when it was placed in the House bill.

We imposed a tax on patent medicines because they are in the nature of a monopoly and are given certain privileges by the Government and are able to bear a fair share of the tax burden.

A tax on admissions to places of amusement, on cabaret shows, and on ticket speculators was deemed wise. It was felt that the practice of selling tickets for tremendously increased cost above the price asked at the box office was an evil which could be remedied, and also that some revenue could be raised.

We also placed a tax on opera boxes and a tax on performances admission to which costs above 25 cents. This will not affect the moving-picture show where the poor go and where they will obtain diversion during these trying times of war.

A stamp tax on bonds, capital-stock sales and transfers, drafts, promissory notes, warehouse receipts, and railroad tickets and sources of that kind has also been imposed. These things have always been considered proper subjects of taxation.

As to the stamp tax on checks, we originally had a $5 exemption, but I am glad to say it was struck out, because I do not think it would have been a benefit to the poor man, for the average poor man does not use checks. On the other hand, it would have made endless trouble for the banks; it would have tended to a multiplicity of checks, and it would probably have prevented checks being printed with the revenue stamp affixed. I favored a higher stamp tax on checks. I think 2 cents would have been better than 1 cent; but the majority of the committee thought otherwise.

A tax on the parcel post is imposed. We did that because we put a tax on express packages, and we thought that it was a proper way of raising revenue, and that there should not be a discrimination made in favor of the parcel post and against the express companies.

We also imposed a tax on freight, and on playing cards, and on tea, coffee, cocoa, and sugar. It was the feeling of your committee that the taxes on tea, coffee, and cocoa were very small. It was the belief that they were so small that the tax would be paid by the wholesaler and not transmitted to the consumer. They are all import commodities, the profit in them is very large, and the tax can well be paid by the wholesaler, but even if paid by the consumer it will be an extremely light tax.

In the case of sugar the tax was placed at a half a cent a pound, which means that if a family uses 15 pounds of sugar a month the tax for the year will amount to approximately 85 cents a year, even if the consumer has to pay. This tax, it is estimated, will raise a very considerable amount of revenue.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. GERRY. I yield.

Mr. KING. I listened to the explanation of the Senator of the reasons for the imposition of a tax upon the parcel post. It occurs to me, if the Senator will pardon the suggestion, that that is not a proper or a wise subject for taxation. It seems to me it strikes at a Government instrumentality. If the Government improperly or irrationally goes into private business, as, for instance, that of hauling freight, it seems to me that it is not provident or wise to tax that instrumentality of the Government. In the first place, it is a bad precedent for the Government to tax itself, to tax one of its own instrumentalities; and in the second place, as I view the matter, it results favorably to the express companies or those who might be in competition with the Government. If the Government wants to derive revenue from that source—that is, the carrying of parcels and commodities—it ought to increase the rates which are imposed upon the articles carried by the parcel post, but it ought not to resort to a tax upon its own efforts and upon its own instrumentalities. To me it seems very illogical, and I was wondering if the committee had considered the thought which I have attempted to express.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, I think the committee felt as I have indicated, that if a tax were placed on the express companies and a tax were not placed on the parcel post it would work a hardship to the express companies; that the only way to meet the situation was to treat them both alike.

Mr. KING. I think probably the Senator has expressed the reason which prompted the provision; but has it not occurred to the Senator that this proposed legislation will be a bad precedent and will simply mean that if there were any competition between the Government and private parties the Government would feel constrained, following this example, to tax its own instrumentalities, no matter what the business was, for the purpose of aiding private enterprise?

Mr. GERRY. I do not think so. I think that this is an exceptional case. We were seeking to raise revenue, and we thought that we could raise revenue from the express companies without hardship to the people of the country, and that when we did that it was only fair to equalize matters by placing a tax also on the parcel post.

Mr. KING. Could not the same result have been obtained, if the Senator will pardon me, by authorizing an increase in parcel-post rates; so that, instead of getting revenue by means of a direct tax upon parcel-post transportation, it could be obtained by means of an increase in the rates?

Mr. GERRY. Oh, yes; that could be done.

Mr. KING. And thus obviate the bad precedent of taxing an instrumentality of the Government.

Mr. GERRY. That could be done, or we could have taken the tax off the express companies; but in that event, of course, revenue would be lost.

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. GERRY. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. In further answer to the question of my colleague, I desire to say that the tax on the parcel post is so small that the equivalent of it could hardly be placed upon the rates charged for the carriage of parcel-post matter; in other words, it would not amount to a half a cent in some zones and in others it will not amount to a quarter of a cent. Therefore the rates could hardly be advanced so that it could be easily figured out just what charges should be made from zone to zone without increasing the tax upon parcel-post packages more than we have done in the bill.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] has offered an amendment exempting charitable and religious organizations and also societies for the prevention of cruelty to children and cruelty to animals from the provisions of the existing Federal inheritance tax. I believe that such an amendment should be adopted. Under the inheritance tax as now drafted the tax is imposed on the transfer of the estate of the decedent and not upon the individual who receives the legacy.

Under this condition, the tendency is to curtail bequests to benevolent institutions of all kinds. I believe that at the present time, especially with the heavy income tax, the charitable and religious organizations throughout the country are going to suffer heavily, because it is an old axiom that the first thing a man does when he cuts down his expenses is to eliminate part of his charitable giving. That undoubtedly will follow now with increased taxation, and if it follows to any great extent it will put increased burdens on the different States and communities.

I believe that the amendment suggested by the Senator from Montana would go at least a little way toward relieving the situation, because, after all, Mr. President, the charitable and religious institutions of our country are very great institutions for good. Our hospitals and our different organizations for relieving the poor are doing work that the Government would have to do if they did not, and I believe they are doing it a great deal better than it could be done by the Government. I do not think for one moment that any sensible man will dispute the statement that where persons are working purely from religious and philanthropic motives of the highest kind—for example, like the Sisters of Charity—they will perform the work with greater heart, with greater soul, and with greater ability than the mere Government employees. Mr. President, I think that they ought to be encouraged. I think church work of that sort ought to be assisted, and I believe the people of the country are in favor of such action.

The House bill also contained a 10 per cent tariff increase, a proviso that would have greatly affected my State and all the industrial States, if not the entire country. I do not believe that way of amending the tariff is sound. It can not be defended for one moment, because as soon as you start to amend the tariff you must do it scientifically and consider each individual commodity. A flat raise of this sort of 10 per cent is unscientific. It is not equitable. It would prove a hardship, and I believe it would probably disrupt industrial conditions and increase the cost of some of the necessities of life.

The postage rate on first-class mail was raised, and a small increase was made in the rate on second-class mail, and a tax was imposed on newspaper companies of 5 per cent of their profits, with an exemption of $4,000. This was a very difficult tax for the committee to handle, because many newspapers in the country had been built up on what is really a Government subsidy. Many periodicals are carried at a loss under the second-class mail rate. Large numbers of these periodicals are printed in one section of the country and then widely distributed in another. If we had adopted the zone system, as was suggested in the House, we would have ruined countless publications and newspapers, and I think we would have destroyed many valuable industries like the farm journals, the different kinds of publications that have to do with special trades—publications that went intensely into the business life—because of the second-class rates. The rates have existed for a long time, and if you change those rates so that these publications bear their proper proportion of the expense you are going to do great harm to many innocent people. To my mind, the rates as fixed never should have been placed on the basis that they now are; but the fact remains that a subsidy has been given, and under those circumstances I do not believe it would be wise to increase the rates suddenly, destroying these industries, and upset the entire conditions of that trade.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. GERRY. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does not the Senator think that a subsidy of more than $80,000,000 to those who use the second-class mail service is a very large subsidy to be giving the newspapers and magazines—more especially the magazines, because there is where the great cost comes—and does not the Senator think it would be fairer at this time, when we are necessarily required to raise a great deal of money, to take away a part of this enormous subsidy that we are giving those who use the second-class mail service? As I recall, the provision of the Finance Committee increases the cost about $3,000,000. Is that correct?

Mr. GERRY. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. In other words, the Government now loses, to be exact, about $87,000,000, and this provision will reduce the loss to about $84,000,000.

Mr. GERRY. Let me interrupt the Senator. It will reduce the loss more than that. For besides the additional rate imposed on second-class mail there is a newspaper tax of 5 per cent.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator that I think there is quite a difference between most of our newspapers, at any rate, and others of those who use second-class mail facilities. The newspapers within a certain zone of two or three hundred miles pay the cost of transportation now, whereas the great magazines and the great trade journals, the great advertising journals of the country, pay only about one-sixth or one-eighth of the cost of transportation. Does not the Senator think it is a good time now to cut off a part of this subsidy, when the country needs the money as it does? Does the Senator think it is fair to put an additional expense of $50,000,000 upon all those who pay first-class postage and at the same time grant a subsidy of $84,000,000 to the great periodicals and journals of the country?

Mr. GERRY. I will say to the Senator from Tennessee that I do not consider that the system adopted was equitable; and, as I have said before, if it were a new proposition it would not receive my support; but at a time like this the newspapers and magazines of the country are performing a great work. They are circulating news, war news and news on general conditions, throughout the entire country. They are national in character, with the exception of the small journals, small newspapers, and county newspapers, to which the Senator has referred. If a zone system were adopted, as suggested by the House, I am afraid the result would be that each locality would have to publish its own newspaper, and the present publications would lose a great part of their national character. However, I am not defending the logic of the tax as contained in this bill. Briefly, the first-class mail rates were increased in order to raise revenue, and it was believed that that would not put a great hardship on the people. It was a very general tax that could be easily borne. A very slight increase was made in the second-class mail rate, and then a tax of 5 per cent was imposed upon the net income of newspapers, magazines, or periodicals. That will in a way make up for the advantage they have in the use of the mails. The tax will apply only to newspapers and periodicals that are earning in excess of $4,000 annually, and it really is intended to apply only to the prosperous publications.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. GERRY. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have introduced an amendment that is somewhat different from the provision in the House bill—a zone amendment. The amendment which I have introduced provides that for the first 300 miles the rate shall remain exactly as it is now, 1 cent a pound, and then gradually increase until it goes up to 6 cents a pound for the farthest zones. This, as the Senator will see, is quite different from the first zone, as provided for in the House bill. In the first three zones the House bill provides for a rate of 2 cents, whereas the amendment which I propose leaves it at 1 cent, just as it is now. In other words, in the case of the newspapers, for the most part, with very few exceptions, the average distance for which they are sent by mail is less than 300 miles, and they would pay practically the same rate that they are paying now. That is in a measure fair for the reason that the newspapers are in a different situation from the great trade journals, or journals like the Saturday Evening Post and others. It seems to me that we could well afford to fix a zone system, leaving the rate as it is on newspapers for the most part, and increasing it upon these great journals, for instance, like the Saturday Evening Post, to which the Government pays more than $1,000,000, or I believe $3,000,000, of subsidy every year.

Mr. GERRY. But the Senator will realize that under this bill the Saturday Evening Post, for example, will pay a tax of 5 per cent on its net income.

Mr. McKELLAR. I imagine that if the Government contributed $3,000,000 to any particular corporation in the country, that corporation would be very highly pleased to pay a tax of 5 per cent on its net income.

Mr. GERRY. I quite agree with the Senator, but we have a condition, not a theory, to meet, and the committee has deemed this the most reasonable way of meeting it.

Mr. President, as I said in my opening remarks, the main determining factor in this war, if it continues for any length of time, will be the industrial condition of the United States, our prosperity, and the aid, through our great wealth, that we shall be able to give our allies by our loans. We will send our men and we will also do our share, and gladly do our share, in the matter of finance. My own State of Rhode Island is a little State, but while small in area it is great in industry. These income taxes and war-profits taxes will be paid in Rhode Island, and we will pay, considering our size, a very large proportion; but, Mr. President, we will pay it gladly, and especially if we believe that in paying it we are doing something that will save the lives of many of our men.

In the Civil War Rhode Island more than furnished her quota in men. She will do the same in this great war, for I believe there is no more patriotic State in the Union. She will not only furnish the men, but her brains, industrial wealth, and ability will be behind the Nation. Bearing our share of the taxes gladly, we shall go forward to do all that is possible in support of our flag, democracy, and America.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California.

Mr. PHELAN. Yesterday afternoon I was interrupted by a parliamentary point which I have since learned was not well taken. I desire now to continue my remarks under my right to address the Senate on a subject which is not unrelated to the pending measure, because the expenditure of the moneys which are provided by the revenue bill is of as much concern to the Senate as the raising of the revenue itself; and possibly a better understanding of the cost of maintaining the Army and naval and maritime establishments would do much to enlighten the Senate in determining exactly the amount of revenue which should be raised.

Of course we derive our information from various sources. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], on July 18, introduced in the Senate a resolution calling upon the President for information concerning the operations of the Shipping Board. A full month has elapsed since then, and I am not aware that the Senate has received the information for which it asked.

I am not here to revive in any way the differences which arose between the several members of the Shipping Board, and which resulted in a change of the personnel of that board. In fact, I am disposed to believe that under all the circumstances the President was justified in making what he called "a clean slate," not repudiating in any sense the policy which had been inaugurated by the Shipping Board, but in order to get a better working membership. There seemed to be some friction, and yet the story has not been wholly told. I believe that the American people are always eager to get the facts and, furthermore, that the American public is fair minded and would be very glad to have a statement from either side of the controversy even now, when it is a settled question, and one which has passed into history; but the truth of history obliges us to give facilities to the gentlemen who have made history.

Only yesterday there was introduced into the RECORD the celebrated treaty of Verona, a document which was negotiated, I think, 100 years ago. If that was of sufficient importance to spread upon the RECORD of the Senate as a matter not of living or vital interest but of historical interest, certainly contemporaneous history has a much greater claim upon our consideration.

Of course, I was moved in the first instance, in bringing up the matter of the Shipping Board, by reason of the fact that one member of that board was a citizen of California, and asked this privilege. It in no way conflicted with the wishes of the President, because when the President called upon him, in the interest of harmony, to send in his resignation, the President in that very letter stated that he must look for a verdict from the people. It is a pleasant euphemism, perhaps, but still accepted by him seriously, that the verdict of the people will ultimately be the true verdict, and that there is no way in which the public may base its judgment except upon a presentation of the facts.

Mr. Denman was the former chairman of this board, and he has delayed making this statement for reasons contained in his letter of August 16, a part of which was published in the daily press, in which he states that he had been waiting for the new board to adopt a policy so that the statements would not lead to controversy there. The new board has adopted its policy, and he seems free to make this statement. The statement is of help to Congress, whose appropriation was being spent, and the people, whose moneys were being spent, and to every administrator in Washington, whether buying aeroplanes or munitions or ships or building cantonments, who has the public money to spend under war-time pressure.

The Shipping Board, during Chairman Denman's administration, began preparations for a large wooden fleet to carry food and munitions to Great Britain and the allies. Seven weeks before we declared war on Germany this was done. Mr. Denman obtained the lowest price for ship timber of any of the negotiators with the timber owners—that is, $5 per thousand less than the price fixed by the lumber committee of the Council of National Defense—with an alternative in the contract that the Government should have the price of the Federal Trade Commission if it were lower than this figure. In connection with the contention made that the differences of opinion were aired in the press, and thereby public clamor raised, I call attention to the fact that it was not Mr. Denman, but Gen. Goethals, superintendent of construction, who began the public discussion. I do not criticize that. I believe in public discussion, and I am glad that the general inaugurated it; but the blame must not be laid upon the president of the board.

In the interests of harmony Mr. Denman has issued only such statements as would free the board, in the public estimation, from the unfortunate implications which would necessarily arise from Gen. Goethals's statement. To refer Mr. Denman to the verdict of the public, and deny him the right to make his statement of the facts in the official RECORD, I contend would be an injustice.

I shall not do more now, unless the controversy is pressed—there should be no controversy; the only object was to have the matter spread in the RECORD, and not to create discussion. I shall do no more than to confine myself to submitting a statement just as made by Mr. Denman:

"The continued success of the submarines, and the recent development of affairs in Russia, seem to indicate that we have entered upon a very long war"——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. PHELAN. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, I presume he is thoroughly familiar with the contents of that long document. The Senator knows that the revenue bill is now pending. He knows how very important it is to the country and to its business interests that there should be speedy action upon this bill. In the interest of time, to facilitate the consideration and final disposition of this great measure, I was going to ask the Senator, if he is familiar with the contents of that document, if he would not be willing to content himself by stating to the Senate exactly the substance of Mr. Denman's statement, instead of reading that long document?

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I am not sufficiently familiar with the contents, having read it but once, and that yesterday, to make a statement that would do justice to the writer of it. I thought yesterday, and I still think, that as a matter of courtesy to a Senator, in view of all the precedents, unanimous consent might be granted by which this document might be printed in the RECORD, and so preserved for historical purposes. Objection has been made, however. Therefore I will not ask the unanimous consent of the Senate, unless the Senator from North Carolina can give me some assurance that it will be granted. Therefore I must proceed in my right to read the document. I have no disposition to do so, but there seems to be a disposition somewhere even in the mind of a Senator who by resolution sought the information, to object to spreading this document upon the RECORD. So I have no other recourse.

"CERTAIN INCIDENTS IN THE FORMATION AND ADMINISTRATION OF THE PROGRAM FOR THE INVESTMENT OF THE $750,000,000 APPROPRIATED BY CONGRESS FOR THE CONSTRUCTION OF AN EMERGENCY FLEET OF WOODEN AND STEEL SHIPS

"The continued success of the submarines and the recent development of affairs in Russia seem to indicate that we have entered upon a very, long war, in which Congress will find it necessary to appropriate many billions of dollars. It may be of value to the country at such a time to have a clear insight into some of those forces, public and private, which play upon and shape the policies controlling these enormous expenditures when the pressure of war need compels rapid decision and execution.

"The consideration of the shipbuilding policy of the majority of the Shipping Board divides itself into two main topics:

"1. The events immediately leading up to the eight days of so-called delay, during which we requested but did not receive the basic figures upon which rested the vast program of expenditures which our general manager asked us blindly to accept; and

"2. The previous acts of our general manager which, in our opinion, made necessary a rapid but thorough examination of any broad project of construction and expenditure to which he desired to commit the country.

"The exposition of these matters should not involve a personal controversy. The disagreement as to the attitude of the Government toward the great steel producers and their prices and as to the creation of great wooden shipbuilding plants do not in any way involve the integrity of our general manager. It would be an impertinence even to say this did not Gen. Goethals himself, in authorized statements, seek to treat the matter as personal and one involving his integrity? So far as I am concerned there have been and will be no personalities. Our direct contact with Gen. Goethals has been pleasant, and with the exception of our last meeting, when I pressed him vigorously for the facts, there has been no friction in our discussions. I trust he obtains his command in France. Nothing has occurred which should reflect on his military genius.

"It may be said further concerning this statement, that it is my own. Neither of my associates has assisted in its preparation nor has been asked to share in the responsibility for its publication.

"I.

"In the middle of May the board and Gen. Goethals had agreed on a plan for commandeering for Government ownership all the ships in the shipyards which were under slow construction contracts and speeding them up under governmental pressure. We had also agreed on a plan, suggested by Secretary Redfield several years ago, for fabricated ships. This contemplated the fabrication of a large number of duplicates of all the beams, frames, plates, and other parts of the hull, and the assembling of these parts into completed vessels at various yards. A great increase in speed and some economy in cost was expected. The existing yards, with their going organizations, could be largely utilized to assemble the ships, and new yards were to be established. We have never lost our belief in the practicability and urgent necessity for this class of construction.

"On June 15, 1917, an act of Congress became law, appropriating $750,000,000, a sum 50 per cent larger than the cost of the Panama Canal, for a great shipbuilding project along the lines of the board's suggestions. The act gave the President the right to delegate the power to invest this money. On July 11, 26 days later, the President delegated this power to the Shipping Board, to be exercised through its Emergency Fleet Corporation. In a letter he specifically stated the responsibility and power both as to policies and the terms of the fabricating contracts to be in the board. Until July 11 neither the Shipping Board nor Gen. Goethals had any legal power to commandeer ships on the stocks or to contract for fabricated ships.

"Realizing the necessity for the utmost expedition, both Gen. Goethals and myself, during the period while the power lay with the President, continued to make contracts for many steel and wooden vessels of the ordinary standard types, feeling confident that the President would ultimately place the power where one or the other could procure a ratification.

"It should be noted also that during the entire time of Gen. Goethals's employment I have signed, as soon as I have read them, every contract sent to me by him save one. This was signed after four days' delay, during which time the tentative price of $95.20 a long ton for steel was changed to a tentative price of $56. The lower amount was justified as a tentative figure by a careful expert study of steel prices, based on the steel corporation's figures. Having in view the Government's power to commandeer the ore products and scrap and the steel and pig-iron plants, the price may well be lower. With but $50,000,000 of capital, we obligated the Emergency Fleet Corporation, according to Gen. Goethals's summary, for 1,218,000 tons of wooden ships and 642,000 tons of steel ships (standard; not fabricated) at a total cost of about $275,000,000. We had 100 more wooden ships under negotiation, which we would have contracted for even if the delegation of power had been further postponed. It is quite safe to say that no corporate officers in the world have ever so far exceeded their authority. The submarine losses, constantly before me, made this action seem no more than normal.

"After our understanding in May, we expected Gen. Goethals to prepare for our consideration a well-worked-out plan for fabricating ships and for the speeding up of construction already begun. On July 13, Gen. Goethals announced, without consulting the board, that on the following Monday he would offer certain contracts for fabricated ships, amounting to $350,000,000, and also would put into effect a plan to commandeer the ships in the yards. The latter involved a huge unestimated sum, and suggested a vital change regarding our policy toward ships which the yards had contracted to build for aliens.

"As soon as we could we convened the board, of which two members were away. The meeting came on the afternoon of Monday, the 16th, but I had previously asked for copies of the fabricating contracts Gen. Goethals was to offer, and an estimate of the cost of the commandeering and speeding-up plan.

"The information we requested should have been in our hands within two hours after the request if this program was really ready for serious consideration. To our surprise we learned Tuesday that the contracts to be offered on the previous day had never been drawn up, and that in the two months since we had agreed on the commandeering plan, no careful calculations of its cost had been made nor had there even been obtained copies of the existing construction contracts of the ships he proposed to commandeer.

"We requested that the fabricating contracts should be drawn up in at least the form in which Gen. Goethals had said he would offer them, and be submitted to us for our approval. A blank draft reached us Wednesday. A copy follows. It tells its own story:

"At my request, you have drawn plans subject to my approval, for the erection of a shipyard at ———, on land which you now hold under option. This land you are ready to rent to the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation at 6 per cent of its cost for the period for which it is needed for the work covered by this order. The plant (aside from the land) is to be paid for and owned by the corporation.

"You will undertake, as agents for the corporation, to the best of your ability, to build such shipyard and to construct in it, within ——— months, approximately 200 ——— deadweight ton steel fabricated ships, in accordance with plans and specifications to be furnished to you by the corporation. It is our intention that you are to have general charge of the work.

"We recognize that you will have to call on the corporation and, through the corporation, on the Government for cooperation in the purchase of materials and in transportation. For the work you are to furnish at your own expense the services of that portion of the organization required which is outlined in the attached schedule, and will give the experience and services, in a consulting and advisory capacity, of the corporate organizations of ——— and the executive officers of their division of construction and engineering, and the executive officers and engineering staff of ———.

"All obligations entered into by you are to be subject to our approval and are to be paid for by the corporation.

"At the present cost of labor, and with steel at $——— a short ton, it is estimated that these boats will cost approximately $——— per deadweight ton.

"As compensation for your services, you will be paid a fee equal to $——— per deadweight ton construction, that fee to be increased ——— cents for each dollar by which, exclusive of our fee, the cost of such tonnage construction falls below ———. The fee shall also be increased for each ton of constructed ship $——— for each five days that any ship is completed in 1918 in advance of the schedule attached. If the cost goes above $——— per ton, such fee shall be decreased to $——— per ton. If it goes above $——— per ton, such fee shall be decreased to $——— per ton. Such computation of fees is to be based on the price of steel above stated and on present scale of wages for direct labor on the work.

"Payments on account of the compensation equal to ——— per cent of ——— per cent of moneys expended shall be made as the work progresses, with semiannual adjustments. Your share of the savings under $——— will be computed on the average of all boats constructed by you, and paid at the termination of the contract. The increased fee for completion in advance of schedule will be computed upon each individual ship.

"What we are proposing to you is a straight agency contract, so that if at any time we should become dissatisfied with the services being rendered or wish to discontinue the work we are at liberty to terminate your employment on ——— days' notice in writing. In that case the compensation for your services to be paid shall be in proportion to the work performed; and if not agreed upon, shall be determined by arbitration, one arbitrator to be appointed by you, one by us, and a third to be selected by the President of the United States.

"As a part of this arrangement, you would have an option, executed concurrently herewith, to purchase the property of the corporation at a valuation to be determined by arbitration in the same manner. This option may be exercised after ——— and shall continue for a period of ——— months, whether or not you remain the agents during all that period.

"In case you do not exercise your option before ——— you are to give the corporation an option to extend until ——— to take over from you the land purchased by you and rented to the corporation at its then complete cost to you.

"At an interview it appeared that under the terms of one of the contracts a $20,000,000 governmental assembling plant was to be built on a leasehold. The land itself was worth, according to Gen. Goethals, but $880,000, or under 5 per cent of the investment. An option to purchase the plant was to be given to the private owner of the land, in this case the American International Corporation, one of the Vanderlip group of companies. The proposed plant was to consist largely of piling, docks, and improvements permanently attached to the land.

"It will be noted that it was the private person who had the option on the Government plant. The Government had no option until the private corporation had refused to exercise its right. The attorneys, Messrs. Cotton and Rublee, share in the responsibility for this provision.

"With such an extraordinary provision in the contract, we were necessarily the more anxious to have the figures of the cost of the ships to be fabricated. The total cost was stated to be $150 per deadweight ton plus $9 commission plus upkeep and amortization of the plant; in all, around $175 per deadweight ton. This was with the steel at 2½ cents per pound for plates. We were reliably advised that England was constructing merchant vessels of this type on a double-shift 'speed-up' program at a total cost of under $80 per deadweight ton, with steel at 3 cents per pound.

"We wished to know the reason for the difference, and asked for the main subheads making up the total cost of the fabricated ship, particularly those showing the division of the cost of the work between the private fabricating plants and the Government assembling yards. If the figures had justified the larger amount of the proposed contracts, we would have promptly authorized them.

"To our astonishment, Gen. Goethals said he could not remember even these main items in the total; that he had no copy of the figures in the records of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, and that the only copy was with the American International Corporation, a powerful and efficient institution allied through its directorate with the United States Steel Corporation. He said he would try to get them, but had not done so up to Tuesday, July 24, eight days after the date he was to offer the contracts, when the President accepted our resignations. It should be noted that Gen. Goethals's published program stated the Government was to offer the contracts, though these basic figures were not in its records.

"When we first asked Gen. Goethals for this necessary data, his office promptly gave out to the press that we were holding up the building of ships, and both indirectly and in personal interviews he continued to give this impression to the many journalists with whom he talked."

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). The Senator will state it.

Mr. PENROSE. My point of order is that I observe the stenographer has not been continuously taking down the remarks of the Senator from California. I ask that these remarks be taken down as he delivers them. I do not want a page skipped of this document and then have it surreptitiously inserted in the RECORD. I want the Senator to read every line of it, and then we will take proper action of the Senate, perhaps, to have it expunged from the RECORD. I hope the Chair will order the stenographer to take down the statement of the Senator from California as he makes it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The stenographer will observe the admonition of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. I am justified in making the point, because I observed the stenographer was not taking it down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest that the stenographer observe the rule.

Mr. PENROSE. Then we will compare the stenographer's notes with the document at a later period.

Mr. PHELAN. I am surprised that the reading of a sober document should excite any heat on the part of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. I am naturally aroused, because when 10,000 men are killed every day and a hundred million dollars spent each day the Senator shows little appreciation of the dreadful seriousness of the crisis when he fools away time with this idle performance. This is not a place for obituary ceremonies. This man was haled from obscurity, and he has returned to obscurity, and merely because he comes from California an old and tedious story ought not to occupy the time of the Senate.

The only persons entitled to obituary ceremonies in this body are the Members of this body. If every State that has some citizen desiring vindication shall require the time of the Senate to be occupied by a recitation of his merits, we would do nothing but engage in such absurd and frivolous performances as the one we witness here to-day.

When the Senator from California interrupts the consideration of the largest revenue bill in our history, the passage of which is urgently required in the greatest crisis of history, to waste the time of the Senate in discussing a man who failed and has passed away he gives us the measure of his statesmanship.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I am particularly pleased that the Senator from the great iron and steel Commonwealth of Pennsylvania should show his extreme displeasure. I hold in my hand a copy of the Washington Post of Thursday, July 19, reproducing under advertising columns, marked "advertisement," an editorial from the New York Evening Journal, in which Gen. Goethals is represented as a giant and Mr. Denman as a pygmy. I think, sir, that is the meanest kind of criticism, intended to do injury to the reputation and standing of the president of the board. But that does not concern me so much as the consideration of the fact, who paid for that advertisement? I do not know who has been more interested in belittling Mr. Denman than the great Steel Corporation of the State of Pennsylvania represented on this floor by Senator PENROSE. When he says that there is no use of pronouncing obituaries, I beg to submit that it is a very live question whether this Government shall be controlled by the Steel Corporation, with its enormous capitalization of over a thousand million dollars, making enormous profits, sufficient if employed by designing and wicked men to overturn the Government of the United States by the ordinary processes of corruption and bribery, and when it is used to destroy a man who I believe was rendering faithful public service in the interest of the Government and not in the interest of the profiteers, then, I say, well may the Senator from Pennsylvania, the representative of such a community embracing such a corporation, be moved to stigmatize this gentleman as unworthy of even a mild defense, expressed in his own language, until I was provoked, against the machinations of such powerful interests.

That is the question before the Senate and before the country to-day, and I beg to assure the Senator from Pennsylvania that it is not dead. If there is to be a funeral, it shall not be for the interment of this gentleman who leaves public office with his shield bright and his honor safe, after having rendered substantial public service. It is only because he was harnessed to a man who on account of his military training could not brook even the restraint of the law imposed upon him in the delegated power to the corporation by the President, that it was necessary as a practical question to clean the slate and begin anew. I think the President was justified, because, after all, if a concern is to be conducted by two men they must work in harmony, and it was clearly demonstrated that these two men did not work in complete harmony.

But the president of the corporation had not emerged from obscurity to return to obscurity, "to lie in cold obstruction and to rot." He was for 20 years a leader of the bar of the city of San Francisco. He conducted a business bearing upon admiralty. He was the only admiralty attorney in the United States who supported the shipping law which prevented the arrest of seamen like common criminals, and who upheld Congress in the enactment of the law which gave to the men who conduct our shipping upon the high seas that decent treatment to which they were entitled, certainly as much as the men upon the shore. He excited many animosities by his fearless and courageous public course. I will not go into that because it is hardly relevant, but I want to say that at a time when the city of San Francisco was beset by corruptionists, great and powerful corporations who came out of the East and invaded our city and seized the railroad system and precipitated an orgy of unspeakable civic debauchery, it was Mr. Denman who was among the first to volunteer his services to bring order out of chaos and to reestablish our community on the firm basis of public good. He served only the public and never served private interests, and because he is a man of that character I do not think it becomes the Senator from Pennsylvania to assail him. I shall, of course, read this verbatim et literatim, not that I take any pleasure in reading it, but it seems to me from the necessity of the case I am driven to read it.

It is the privilege of a Senator to exhaust the Senate, and the Senate will be exhausted before I am exhausted. Whether girt around by friends or foes, in the British Parliament a man may speak the thing he will, and in this Chamber he has the identical privilege. I am sorry that it delays the public business, but I am sincere in stating that the underlying lesson of this tract bears upon the integrity of this Government, and that it is well for all men to know the machinations by which the Shipping Board was sought to be used for the purpose of wresting from the Treasury and from the taxpayers extortionate and excessive sums for the work required. If that is not relevant and pertinent to this discussion when we are considering a revenue bill on its passage to enactment, then I can not understand what is relevant or what is pertinent. To continue the reading where I left off, on page 10—

"With his great reputation, Gen. Goethals's statement set the tone of newspaper criticism, and during the next eight days succeeding July 16 the storm of public impatience, which had been gathering since June 15, when Congress passed the bill authorizing the expenditure of the $750,000,000, burst on the Shipping Board, and particularly on its chairman.

"Simultaneously with this natural response of the press to Gen. Goethals's suggestion there was fed into the newspapers by interested persons much false matter tending to discredit the board and to force the acceptance of the program with its fabricating contracts and suggested surrender of the ships on our stocks to alien buyers. The pressure was heightened by the paid reproduction in the advertising space of two of Washington's most prominent dailies of a full-page Hearst editorial, slurring the chairman of the board, the cabling from London to the press of erroneous figures grossly exaggerating the extent of the submarine losses, and the publication of letters cleverly written over the name of a disgruntled ex-member of the board containing much abuse and misstatement of fact. The first paragraph of one of these letters was so drawn that it caused a headline in a great number of the largest newspapers in the country stating the signer's demand for the chairman's removal. Much of the publicity was suggestive of the journalism of the Hearst school, and the cumulative policy of Lord Northcliffe's papers in their various attacks, often enough justified from the standpoint of English interest, on public men in Great Britain.

"An able and forceful representative of one of the corporations which was to build some 200 of the fabricated ships told us his people would withdraw from the project unless we agreed to accept Gen. Goethals's total figures. The loss of time necessary to find others to estimate upon and accept a contract for such construction made this last coercive suggestion most difficult to withstand.

"Gen. Goethals at no time procured the copies of the contracts necessary to carry out the board's plan of commandeering all the vessels under construction. Admiral Capps, his successor, after another week's delay, has now found that he must proceed piecemeal with a much modified commandeering plan, working out the ownership and contractual relationships as he goes along. He should have had in hand from Gen. Goethals all these contracts when he entered on his work, and a reasonably close estimate of the cost. The board's demand for this data did not hold up the commandeering. The demand would have hastened its execution had Gen. Goethals responded.

"Admiral Capps has now had double the time during which we were asking for this data to consider the fabricating contracts and has not yet executed them. He, too, requires the essential figures. The retiring members of the Shipping Board are not regretful that they did not yield to the eight days' pressure of impatient clamor, stimulated in the improper ways above described.

"The President, on the eighth day of the public pressure, accepted Gen. Goethals's resignation, which he had filed in response to a previous letter and sent me the following letter requesting mine:

"'THE WHITE HOUSE.
"'Washington, July 24, 1917.

"'MY DEAR MR. DENMAN: I hope and believe that I am interpreting your own best judgment as well as my own when I say that our duty concerning the debates and misunderstandings that have arisen in connection with the shipbuilding program ought to be settled without regard to our personal preferences or our personal feelings altogether and with the single purpose of doing what will best serve the public interest. No decision we can now arrive at could eliminate the elements of controversy that have crept into almost every question connected with the program, and I am convinced that the only wise course is to begin afresh—not upon the program, for that is already in large part in process of execution, but upon the further execution of it.

"'I have found both you and Gen. Goethals ready to serve the public at a personal sacrifice. Realizing that the only manner in which the way can be completely cleared for harmonious and effective action is to carry our shipbuilding plans forward from this point through new agencies, Gen. Goethals has put his resignation in my hands; and I have adopted it in the same spirit in which it was tendered—not as deciding between two men whom I respect and admire, but in order to make invidious decisions unnecessary and let the work be developed without further discussion of what is past. I am taking the liberty of writing to tell you this in the confidence that you will be glad to take the same disinterested and self-forgetting course that Gen. Goethals has taken. When you have done as he has done I am sure that you may count with the utmost confidence upon the ultimate verdict of the people of the country with regard to your magnanimous and unselfish view of public duty and upon winning in the retrospect the same admiration and confidence that I have learned to feel for you.

"'With much regard and very great appreciation of the large services you have rendered.

"'Cordially and sincerely yours,

"'WOODROW WILSON.

"'HON. WILLIAM DENMAN,
"'United States Shipping Board.'

"Entirely apart from any interest Congress may have in the events surrounding the initiation of its first great shipbuilding project, this courteous permission to seek a public verdict might warrant this statement. From such a source such a suggestion removes the fear of any self-respecting man that he may permit his sense of participancy in a public event to exaggerate its importance. However, we are at war. There is no time to be wasted on personal vindications. If the facts as summarized here for the first time will not be of helpful guidance to other men in positions of public trust and having the responsibility for the rapid expenditure of public moneys, the sooner they are forgotten the better.

"The interested reader of the President's letter must not conclude from its kindly personal tone that the disagreement was between Gen. Goethals and myself. The disagreement was between Gen. Goethals and a majority of the board. One of these members, Commissioner White, though not in good health, returned to the summer heat of Washington to cast his vote against a blind acceptance of the program, and the other, Commissioner Brent, in spite of my protest, has sent in his letter of resignation, stating his continued full support of the majority's position. The memory of an association with men of such courage and loyalty to a principle in the face of such unjust and purposely coercive criticism is full compensation for many months of driving labor spent in deepening anxiety over the increasing destruction of the submarine.

"In so far as a partial publicity has contributed to the confusion in the public mind, or to the general's discomfiture, he has been its sole cause. His criticism, which he allowed to remain for weeks without correction or explanation, of the project of building wooden ships, made at a great public banquet of the iron and steel men in New York; his announcement, contrary to a different understanding with us, of a tentative $95.20 a long ton rate on steel at a public meeting of the shipbuilders; his publication of his letter to me attacking Messrs. Eustis and Clark, who had developed the wooden-ship scheme and given splendid and unpaid service to the country; his public announcement of the board's program as a finality without consultation with the board; and his recent suggestion to the journalists that we were blocking the building of ships, when we were asking for data which we should have received on two hours' notice—all these involved matters, which, if he had brought them to us, might have been quietly adjusted, but once placed before the public required a public explanation.

"There were questions of broad policy upon which Gen. Goethals and the majority of the board disagreed. These are the questions which the President refers to the public for their approval or disapproval. The public knows Gen. Goethals by his world-wide and well-earned reputation in another field of endeavor, and through his hosts of friends and admirers both in Congress and out. The former chairman of the Shipping Board has been hitherto little known outside his 20 years' association with shipping activities on the Pacific Ocean, and the group of men in the far Western States with whom he has been working, since he left college, for more efficient democratic government. The public must disabuse its mind of these personal questions if it would gain anything of value from the facts here narrated.

"II.

"When Gen. Goethals was employed we promised him the utmost freedom in the execution of any plan or policy we might adopt. This promise applied to the execution, not the framing of the policy. Under the President's order of July 11 we could not have delegated the latter responsibility even had we desired to do so. Our signing without exception all the many contracts he sent us was the performance of our promise. Excepting the basic price of steel for all ships of this material, we felt that the details of costs, which varied with different yard conditions, were entirely within his province.

"On matters of policy regarding the building of an emergency wooden fleet and affecting the basic prices the Government should pay for raw materials, and the methods of procuring a low price, we at first were, or thought we were, in accord. It was not until the latter part of May that we discovered our mistake. To the very last we hoped for an adjustment of the differences.

"Under the following titles we have briefly stated the facts concerning the pertinent incidents in the development of our shipbuilding program. We believe they show that any public official would have been derelict in his duty if he had yielded to the last eight days of impatient pressure and accepted a general manager's program of the character indicated without first receiving and considering his basic figures.

"Here again we wish to emphasize the fact that we do not question that Gen. Goethals in all these matters acted with the fullest integrity, judging him from his own point of view. We disagreed with his acts, but have not questioned his good faith.

"We have never believed in wooden ships as a commercial venture, or as a measure for the permanent upbuilding of our mercantile marine We have felt from the beginning of our investigation of the subject, some seven weeks before the war, and have stated in all our announcements that we desired to construct wooden ships only as a supplement to steel ships. Our purpose was to provide for carriage of food and munitions to Great Britain and her allies during the war. Our belief that we could not provide steel ships in sufficient quantity to meet anything like the anticipated submarine losses in the year from May 15, 1917, has been justified by the average of the five months' losses from February 1 to July 1. These losses exceed in rate by at least 100 per cent the reproduction of steel ships in all the countries of the world which the most sanguine can hope for. If we can obtain wooden ships in any quantity, whether slow or fast in speed, there is an absolute need for them. The slower ships will release the faster steel ships in the coastwise trade. and also relieve the railway congestion. Those of a higher speed will be used for trans-Atlantic service. The board's project for building these ships asked for the appointment of Gen. Goethals as its head, and expressed a hope that we might construct 3,000,000 dead-weight tons of such ships in 18 months. The project was approved by the Council of National Defense after an independent investigation, and then adopted by the President. Gen. Goethals accepted appointment under the board to carry it forward.

"Without any serious investigation he determined that the project could not be a success, and, we have recently learned, actually instructed his agents sent out on May 16, as we supposed to stimulate the construction of a great fleet and enthuse the possible builders of new ways, to discourage their building. He instructed them not to let any contracts until after the ways in new yards were down, though no sane man would invest the large amount necessary to develop a yard unless he knew beforehand on what contracts he could count. Although needing all we could obtain both of wood or steel, he said: 'I do not want to build too many wooden ships.' 'I do not want to build any more wooden ships than absolutely necessary.' 'Let us stop wood as soon as we can.' Referring to the question whether a builder should have any profit on his investment in ways, he said to allow them 'just actual cost, to be authorized by the ships they build. But I would not encourage the construction of too many of those ways. I would rather hold them down to what they have now and to have them utilize all the facilities that they have rather than to branch out on new work.'

"Subsequently at a public dinner in New York, given by the steel interests with the reporters of the Metropolitan dailies present, Gen. Goethals attacked the wooden shipbuilding project, which had been adopted by the President, and its projectors, in language which, to say the least, was very unhappily chosen. Instantly all of the contractors who had been gathering their energies and forces and materials together for the construction of these ships slackened their efforts and some of them gave up entirely. Although the reporters of the many dailies in New Yory substantially agreed on Gen. Goethals's remarks, some of his friends six weeks later insisted that he was misquoted. During this six weeks' period, when the discouraging influence of the remarks on the builders of the country had had full play, the general made no contradiction or correction either to the public or to Congress or to the members of the Shipping Board. Whether misquoted or not, his silence had as depressing an effect on the project he had been employed to carry out as if he had spoken the words the papers unanimously attributed to him.

"Gen. Goethals stated at this time that we could not build over 150 wooden ships in the 18 months succeeding. Since then, under constant pressure from the public and from the board, he has recently let, or had under negotiation, contracts which, even with the slowly constructed and elaborate design he has chosen, would give us a million and a half tons of ships in 18 months, or a million dead-weight tons more than he said could be constructed. We still had offers for 400 more ships, which would give us another million dead-weight tons. The elaborate design of hull referred to is estimated to cost considerably more and to take a third longer time to construct and to require much more highly skilled labor than other designs approved by the American Bureau of Shipping, whose rules the general had made the standard of construction in many of his contracts. It calls for a most unusual size and cut of ship timbers, which it has been difficult for the lumber mills to supply.

"(2) THE PRICE OF STEEL.

"Before the board embarked on its wooden-ship project it endeavored to get contracts for the construction of steel vessels, but was informed by the shipyards that the steel could not be obtained. After the wooden-ship project was underway the board quietly declared its intention to commandeer the steel-producing plants, and almost immediately the president of the largest steel corporation sent word that he desired to see the chairman of the Shipping Board. We requested Gen. Goethals to take the matter up with the steel president, and the general reported back that the steel producers had agreed to furnish a very large amount of ship steel, and had shown him figures which satisfied him that 4¼ cents per pound, or $95.20 per long ton, for plates was a fair price. Gen. Goethals based his estimates to Congress for the appropriation of the $750,000.000 on vessels constructed of steel at $95.20 per long ton. In all his appearances before the congressional committees he showed no dissatisfaction with this price. We have since been offered the steel in quantities sufficient to take care of all our needs at $28 per ton less than this figure.

"Until the bill reached the conference committee, I accepted Gen. Goethals's assurance of the propriety of this price. I then learned of his error and advised a member of the committee that they could expect the steel at a much lower figure. Gen. Goethals finally agreed with us that 4¼ cents a pound was not a fair price. In spite of this, he later announced at a public meeting at which reporters were present that the contracts for the construction of steel vessels should be based on a tentative price for steel plates of 4¼ cents a pound, or $95.20 per long ton. Such a recognition, even tentative, gave a respectability to the price which would place us and every other department of the Government in an absurd position in any subsequent bargaining.

"At about this time ship contracts were sent to us by the general containing a basic tentative price of 4¼ cents per pound for plates, giving still further respectability to this entirely unwarranted figure. I declined to sign such contracts, and they were revised to a base of 2½ cents a pound, or $56 per long ton, the justification for which I have before described. In any event, it set a better point for the Government in bargaining than the higher figure.

"(3) COMMANDEERING OF STEEL PLANTS.

"The Shipping Board proposed a bill placing in the United States Government the power to commandeer the iron and steel producing plants. Gen. Goethals was strongly opposed to this. For a time, I acquiesced in his assurance that he could rely on his friend, President Farrell, of the Steel Corporation, to obtain fair treatment for the Government without its securing the power to commandeer the ore and scrap steel and the pig iron and steel plants. Before the bill was out of the conferees' hands, however, I had discovered his mistake and advised one of the members of the conference committee. The bill as passed gave the President the power. I do not believe that in any event Congress would have accepted the general's assurance of his ability to control these steel men by a mere friendly relationship.

"(4) REFERENCE OF THE PRICE OF STEEL TO THE ADVISORY COMMISSION OF THE COUNCIL OF NATIONAL DEFENSE.

"Gen. Goethals, without consultation with the Shipping Board, after the disagreement on the $95.20 tentative rate, referred the question of fixing the price of steel to the advisory board of the Council of National Defense. The iron and steel committee of this board was made up of Judge Gary and Mr. Farrell, of the United States Steel Corporation, and other steel producers. A meeting was held with members of the advisory body, which was attended by Mr. Farrell, Gen. Goethals, and myself, and one or two others, though no representatives of the Army or Navy were present. An attempt was made to have us agree on a price for plates for our ships. At this meeting Mr. Farrell assured us of his patriotism and said that he appeared at the meeting in the dual capacity of a member of the Government advisory board and as a representative of the steel producers, who were trying to sell to the Government. In the course of the conversation, he stated that wages in the steel industry had risen 43 per cent since the year 1916. I asked him what percentage the wages bore to the total cost of ship's plates, and he said that that was a matter of a technical character which he did not think was a necessary part of the discussion. I replied that I did not see the relevancy of his suggestion that there had been a 43 per cent rise in wages over the last preceding year, unless we knew what percentage labor figured in the total cost of the product. He did not give me even an approximation of this percentage.

"I then asked him what the steel ship plates had cost the Steel Corporation to produce in the year 1916, including interest on the investment and amortization on its plant. This is a matter which is figured to the fourth or fifth decimal in a well-conducted establishment. It is a figure which a person bargaining with the Government should have known definitely. He stated that he did not know the cost in 1916. I then asked him whether the cost was 3 cents or less per pound. He said he did not know. I then asked him whether the cost was 4 cents or less per pound. He said he did not know. I then asked him whether the cost was 5 cents or less per pound. He said he did not know. I did not have the temerity to ask him whether it cost 6 cents or less per pound. I felt that negotiations conducted with one who was at once an advisor to the Government and a merchant selling it goods, who had come for the specific purpose of fixing the purchase price and yet did not have even this general information, would be a fruitless endeavor. Gen. Goethals did not participate in this discussion. It may be interesting to note that within a fortnight after this interview another member of the same company offered us all of the steel plate that the Government required for its various programs at 3 cents a pound.

"(5) REFERENCE OF PRICE TO FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

"We then announced, on June 20, that we desired to have the costs investigated by the Federal Trade Commission, and suggested that a price should be fixed by the Government not only for the steel for Government use but for all industries. This is along the line of the policy pursued by Great Britain, where there is a Government supervision of the distribution of steel to various consumers. My reason for suggesting that the Government should fix the price for all purchases of steel is that, in view of the great subtraction for Government use from the total supply, a grossly excessive price could be charged to the private consumers whose demand would be increasingly intense with the supply so diminished.

"The investigation of the cost has been referred to the Federal Trade Commission, with the approval of the President. Whether the broader policy will be followed has not yet been announced. The terms of the act seem sufficiently large to warrant the Government commandeering the various plants to obtain its own supply, and the sale of the surplus to the public. As different plants produce at different rates, and a stimulation of all the producers seems necessary, it is apparent that either the most costly producers' price must be paid to all the producers, or that the Government should buy all the steel at the varying cost prices plus a fair profit. It could then resell at a unit price which averaged the cost, thus combining full production with a price which is at once uniform and a minimum. If the act should not be deemed broad enough for this purpose, Congress will, I trust, enlarge its provisions.

"(6) SIZE OF THE APPROPRIATION.

"We agreed with Gen. Goethals in May that we would ask Congress for $1,000,000,000 for the construction of ships, and two days later a meeting was held at the White House, which was attended by certain of the leaders of Congress, at which I developed the board's program along the agreed lines. When I had finished my statement, one of the Congressmen arose and said that he had seen Gen. Goethals the night before, and that the general had desired him to state that he needed but three-quarters of a billion dollars. This was the first that we had heard of the general's change of mind. With our then contemplated expenditure for steel vessels, namely, about $450,000,000, and $250,000,000 for the taking over of vessels on the stocks, this left us with $50,000,000 of the appropriation for wooden ships, to which could be added the $50,000,000 previously appropriated for the Shipping Board. With this we could not have constructed over 200 wooden ships. The general's suggestion as to the smaller total was adopted by Congress, but under the public pressure we have previously referred to we have been able to persuade him to let contracts, very largely in the last month of his incumbency, for 328 wooden ships, at a cost of $120,000,000, and were about to close contracts for 100 more such ships, at a cost of nearly $50,000,000 additional. The board is now seeking $500,000,000 more from Congress, and if the war continues another two years, will probably require another $500,000,000.

"(7) ALIEN TONNAGE ON OUR STOCKS.

"In the period between February 10 and April 1 the British Government, through the agency of the Cunard Co., obtained contracts in our steel shipbuilding yards for the construction of 1,000,000 dead-weight tons of steel ships. This took up practically all our then available yard space. After we had entered the war, I had various negotiations with Mr. Balfour, as a result of which he graciously offered, in a letter addressed to me, to release these contracts to the United States. Most of the agreements were on a single shift slow construction basis. To speed them up would involve the depletion of labor and material from other classes of construction, and a deep disturbance of American enterprises for which the mere payment of extra "speeding up" wages to the labor on the ships could not compensate. We felt that, in any event, with the enormous destructivity of the submarine, these ships should be kept under our own flag for their almost certain use in carrying our troops and supplies to France.

"Although fully cognizant of these negotiations, Gen. Goethals, without consultation with the Shipping Board, on July 13 announced that, after investigation, he was satisfied that these alien contractors would pay the cost of expediting ships now building for them and take them off our hands. I frankly disagreed with Gen. Goethals in making such an announcement on such a delicate subject. He has since advised us that he had no information to the effect that the British or any foreign contractors will pay the cost or is desirous of doing so or of taking the ships off our hands.

"The Shipping Board could ill afford to spend the time required in adjusting these matters. It had other constructive policies, both to meet war need and for the upbuilding of our mercantile marine, which it was framing, always acting under the pressure of the consciousness of the submarine menace and always under the necessity of creating a new branch of its organization as its functions were increased. A brief review of these policies may not be amiss:

"1. The control and reduction of freight and charter rates. This required the commandeering power, which was not delegated to us until July 11, and cooperation with the allies. Negotiations had progressed to the point where the plan could have been put in operation in a very short time after granting the power to commandeer. Quick relief was essential.

"2. The commandeering of all our tonnage, with its continued operation for Government account, but in the hands of the private owners and, as far as possible, consistent with war need in its former routes, carrying materials for our basic war industries.

"3. The carrying out of the agreement made in June between the owners and seamen for a calling back to the sea of the large body of seamen on shore and fixing wages and bonuses during the war.

"4. The chartering and control of neutral tonnage to serve the common war need.

"5. The inauguration of the building of a Diesel motor-driven fleet of merchant ships of the Norwegian George Washington type, which, with the great saving in fuel and cargo space, wide sailing radius, and reduced labor cost, would free us from bunker control of other nations and give us a dominance in maritime carriage after the war.

"WILLIAM DENMAN.

"WASHINGTON, August 14, 1917."

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. LODGE. I will not interrupt the Senator. I thought he was through.

Mr. PHELAN. I have concluded.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized in his own right.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, that Mr. Denman should desire to make an apologia pro vita sua I quite understand, but I do not see why the RECORD should be burdened with it. It seems to me very unfortunate to bring up a subject of discussion of this character. The paper that has just been read by the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] is Mr. Denman's demonstration from his point of view that he ought not to have been removed or driven from office. It therefore reflects upon the action of the President of the United States.

The President of the United States accepted the resignation of Gen. Goethals. He then requested and received the resignation of Mr. Denman. Since then he has had, perhaps, what may be called the good fortune to receive the resignation of Mr. White. He has remodeled the Shipping Board; he has placed at the head of it Mr. Hurley, a man of great energy and executive capacity, thoroughly loyal to the country, thoroughly in sympathy with all that is being done, and, I am sure, certain to drive forward the great business of the construction of shipping. He has put in charge of the shipbuilding Admiral Capps, who has been Chief of the Bureau of Construction of the Navy, one of the ablest and most competent men in the service, whether active or retired. With him is associated Admiral Bowles, who also has been Chief of the Bureau of Construction, highly trained, and the head of a great shipping company. The President in this way has made a highly effective and very strong board, which commands the confidence of the country. I think his action in making this change, which I know must have been disagreeable to him, deserves the highest commendation, and I think it was entirely justified.

I am going to say a few words at this moment, because when the appropriation bill was before the Senate I predicted, referring to a change that had been made in the language, that the plan was to drive Gen. Goethals from office. That plan was pursued, but I think Mr. Denman did not calculate that when Gen. Goethals went from office he would take him with him.

I have no sort of personal feeling about Mr. Denman whatever. Perhaps it argues myself unknown to say that I never heard of him until his name came before the Senate. I should think I might be open to that criticism were it not that I do not think anybody east of San Francisco had heard of him until his name came before the Senate. I had no particular prejudice against him, one way or the other, but I was anxious, above everything in the world, to have the ships and the transports built as rapidly as possible.

Mr. Denman was made chairman of the Shipping Board, and that resulted in the retirement of Mr. Baker, who had been responsible largely for the shipping bill, who was an experienced man in all relating to shipping. I think his life had been devoted to it. In some of his views—I speak wholly disinterestedly—as to the manner of restoring the American merchant marine I did not agree, but no one could question his competency and his knowledge. He was set aside in order that Mr. Denman, who, so far as the world knew, had never built a ship in his life, might have his place. Having taken possession of this important position, I want to call attention in a few words to what happened, as a matter of fact. I am not going into the quarrel between Gen. Goethals and Mr. Denman. It is enough that the quarrel was there.

The fact was, he seems to have quarreled with pretty much everybody. I never crossed his path, so he never quarreled with me. He quarreled with his colleagues. He held the majority of the board only by his own casting vote. Mr. Donald, the only practical shipping man on the board, and Mr. Stevens, who had been a Congressman from New Hampshire, and who was an able and energetic man, were both against him—so much so that I was told that he was endeavoring to force them off the board. The two men who were with him were the two appointees whom the President thoughtfully labeled "Republicans." They never had been heard of in the Republican Party, but those were the two men who supported Mr. Denman and gave him his majority of one. He had difficulties with the advisory commission. There were reflections on the advisory commission which have just been read here to the Senate. They were men selected by the President. I was on none of the committees which had to deal with Mr. Denman, but if anyone will take the trouble to inquire I think he will find that the impression that he made on the committees of the House and of the Senate was not a pleasant or a soothing one.

When a man quarrels with one person, it may be that he is in the right and the other is in the wrong; but when he quarrels with everybody, the presumption is against him.

I am not going into the vexed question of the wooden ship or the steel ship. Personally, I had little faith in the wooden ship. I could not see why it was a good plan to build ships that were both slow and quickly perishable and standardized with difficulty, whereas the one thing we wanted was ships that were fast, enduring, and could be readily standardized; but if they had only given us ships I should have been content.

To pass out beyond the question as between Gen. Goethals and Mr. Denman, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] yesterday mentioned a case where in one yard there was one ship and in another yard there were three ships on the eve of completion, practically completed, to go under a foreign neutral flag. We could have requisitioned them. They all went to sea within a week under the foreign neutral flag. That had nothing to do with Gen. Goethals. He had no power to take them.

The German ships were turned over to the Shipping Board. The two interned ships, which were warships, were taken at the same time by the Navy. They were put in order. They carried some of the first units to France. A few others, if I am correctly informed, four or five, were lent by us to some of the nations who are fighting in the same cause that we are. They are all at sea, if I am correctly informed, but the rest of them were turned over to the Shipping Board to repair and put afloat. There was no question of Gen. Goethals there. There was some 500,000 tons of shipping. That is a good deal at this moment of stress in the shipping world. Time went on, time went on; nothing was done; and finally the Secretary of War, responsible for the transportation of troops, greatly to his credit, succeeded in having those ships transferred from the Shipping Board to the Navy, and within a few days they were all being moved. Some of them have been fitted already. The Navy has been able to find the men to do it, and those ships will all be at work in a very short time.

I think the President has done no better thing for the advancement of the cause that we all have at heart, the great cause of success in this war, than in reorganizing that board. I know, as I repeat, that it must have been a very disagreeable thing for him to do. The country wanted ships. It was absolutely vital; and they were treated to quarrels between Mr. Denman and Gen. Goethals! They wanted ships, and they want them now; and they were told, in elaborate statements, that Mr. Denman was saving money! They wanted ships, and all they heard were these accounts of quarrels in the board, and quarrels with Mr. Denman, and troubles in Congress, and no ships; and three golden months have gone. They are irrecoverable. That is why the President changed the board, and that is what justified him in doing it.

I never should have thought of uttering one word on the subject. The thing was over; it had been well done, and I had no desire to say a single syllable about it. But when it is brought in here to demonstrate in indirect fashion that the President ought to have kept that board and kept Mr. Denman, with his long wake of quarrels behind him, I for one, although I am a minority Member, want to take occasion to say that it is one of the best things that has been done for the advancement of the cause of the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] seems to think that he has been denied the ordinary courtesy granted to Senators when asking that documents and newspaper articles and petitions be placed in the RECORD without reading. I objected to this letter of Mr. Denman going into the RECORD without reading, not because I had any feeling whatever against Mr. Denman, for yesterday I told the Senator from California that if an endeavor had been made by any friend of Gen. Goethals to have put in the RECORD a letter written by him or a statement made by him for the purpose of bolstering up what he considered his position in the unfortunate controversy between himself and Mr. Denman, both ex-members of the Shipping Board, before the Senate again, I would have objected exactly in the same way that I did object in relation to the statement that was asked to be put in the RECORD, made by the chairman of that board, Mr. Denman. So I want the Senator from California to understand that I intended no discourtesy to him; and I am quite sure that every Senator in this Chamber, from what I said yesterday, understood that if any Senator had asked the same thing of the Senate with reference to the other member of that board in dispute with Mr. Denman I would have objected in the same way.

Mr. President, the Senator refers to the resolution that I offered in the Senate on July 18, which passed the Senate on July 19, asking for certain information in relation to the contracts that had been let by the Shipping Board, and also what had been accomplished by the board up to that time. The reason why I offered that resolution was that on September 8, 1916, the Shipping Board was created; months passed before there was a nomination made by the President, and yet we were told when the Shipping Board bill was before the Senate that the very existence and life of our Nation was at stake and it was disloyalty to even oppose its immediate passage. In that bill there was an appropriation of $50,000,000, with authority given to the board to purchase ships or to lease ships or to obtain ships in any way for the purpose of handling our commerce, which was most inadequate.

The President has not yet seen fit to answer the resolution. It may be that it will be answered. I hope so; and I hope so for the reason that since the introduction of that resolution I have received letters from all parts of this country calling attention to what the writers claim they know to be a fact, that there have been contracts let not for the best interests of the Government of the United States, and that there has been influence—political and otherwise—that has ruled the granting of the contracts.

I have been told, Mr. President, that overnight a broken-down politician, absolutely without financial responsibility and living on the charity of his political friends, blossomed out into a "great shipbuilder," with contracts amounting to millions of dollars, and the Government of the United States advancing 10 per cent of the amount of the contract to a man who never was in business in his life, who never had a shipyard, and who never had a piece of machinery to begin the building of ships. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] asks me who it was. Mr. President, I would prefer not to state until the resolution is answered. Another thing I want to say to the Senator is that I am not in the habit of bringing the contents of letters before the Senate, because I know, many times, that the questions discussed are often magnified. In this case I have taken a little time to examine into the question whether such an occurrence happened, and when the resolution is answered I may have something more to say upon that question.

Mr. President, the Shipping Board was created. I think the confirmations were made in the latter part of January of this year, months after the board was authorized by law. Scarcely had the board been organized until the public press began to report that there were disagreements between the chairman of the board and Gen. Goethals; and the situation got so serious that in July I thought, to bring the question to a head, that I should offer the resolution, which I did on July 18, so that the Senate might know just what the Shipping Board had done from the day of its organization down to that time.

The President no doubt studied the situation carefully, and he acted for what he thought were the best interests of our country, and accepted the resignation of Gen. Goethals and requested and accepted the resignation of Mr. Denman as chairman of the Shipping Board. As far as the Senate was concerned, and I was going to say as far as the country was concerned, that settled the question in dispute between those two Government employees. We thought it had, but scarcely had the action been taken by the President than we found that Mr. Denman entered into a discussion of the injustice that had been done him and a defense of his position in the leading newspapers of the country. Nobody could object to that. He had a perfect right to do so; but when he comes into the Senate and asks that his argument sustaining his position be made a part of the public RECORD, I thought it was going too far, and I objected to its being placed in the RECORD without reading.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. STONE. I do not know just what the significance of these remarks of the Senator may be——

Mr. SMOOT. I will tell the Senator. Yesterday evening the senior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] asked that a certain statement published by Mr. Denman, outlining his actions as president of the Shipping Board and giving his reasons for the disagreements that had taken place between himself and Gen. Goethals, might be printed in the RECORD without reading.

Mr. STONE. And to that the Senator from Utah objected?

Mr. SMOOT. And to that I objected last night; and to-day the Senator from California read that statement into the RECORD. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] rose at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from California and made a few observations upon the situation, and I then took the floor, and that is the reason of my statement.

Mr. STONE. I happened not to be present when the Senator from Massachusetts spoke, but I assume that his remarks were in vindication of Gen. Goethals.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I do not think the Senator from Massachusetts took the side of either Goethals or Denman. He referred particularly to what had actually happened, and how, in his opinion, the request that this matter be brought to the attention of the Senate at this time was at least doubtful.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, if the Senator will indulge me for a moment——

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. STONE. If it does not unduly break in upon his remarks——

Mr. SMOOT. No; I have not very much more to say.

Mr. STONE. I should like to say this:

Some weeks ago, when the difference between Mr. Denman and Gen. Goethals arose and was brought in some way to the attention of the Senate, which was in the beginning of that controversy——

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that that was in June, when the appropriation bill was before the Senate.

Mr. STONE. Very likely. I took occasion then to say that I was glad that a man of Mr. Denman's type was at the head of the Shipping Board, because he had prevented Gen. Goethals from making contracts or initiating contracts for steel at $95 a ton when the Navy Department was buying the same kind of steel at $56 per ton. I think I am stating the figures as they were stated at that time; and, pursuing that subject, I was provoked by the interruption of some Senator to say something respecting Gen. Goethals—not much, but something—not of a complimentary kind.

Mr. President, I do not withdraw a thing I said at that time about Mr. Denman or about Gen. Goethals; but I wish to say that while I believe that any proposal to pay $95 a ton for steel when it was being sold to the Government for a little more than half that, and especially, sir, to pay one hundred and fifty-odd dollars a ton, which I see in the papers was the last proposal, is unconscionable—while I believe that, and to that extent I put myself upon the side of Mr. Denman, beyond that I put myself upon the side of Gen. Goethals, as I understood his attitude, in favor of building steel ships instead of wooden hulls. To put the great bulk of this enormous sum of money that we appropriated—$800,000,000 now, with $500,000,000 requested—for the construction of ships into cheap wooden construction for temporary use does not meet my approval; and I think Gen. Goethals was wiser than Mr. Denman, and had a better and a more far-reaching vision, if I understood correctly the position he took of building ships that would be worth something to the United States as a commercial entity or force after the war. The steel ships would be worth something to us after the war; the wooden ships would be junk.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate now to this oft-repeated story that Gen. Goethals agreed to pay $95 a ton for steel that was to be purchased by the Shipping Board for the construction of the ships ordered by that board. The Senator from California, in reading the statement of Mr. Denman, laid special emphasis upon the statement in that letter that Gen. Goethals had agreed to pay $95 a ton for steel entering into the construction of ships. The truth is, Mr. President, that Gen. Goethals wanted to get the construction under way. There was no agreed price for steel. The price asked by the steel manufacturers was 4¼ cents per pound, as stated in that letter. It never was accepted by Gen. Goethals; but in order to get the construction of the ships under way he accepted conditionally the price named, and the price that the Government of the United States should pay was to be determined later, after a full investigation of the cost of producing the steel.

When Chairman Denman and Gen. Goethals appeared before the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate Gen. Goethals made the statement that the price named for the construction of ships of $153 per ton was based upon steel costing 4¼ cents a pound. At the same time he stated to the committee that the cost of wooden ships would be $135 a ton. Chairman Denman heard that statement made to the committee. He never then stated that he objected to the price that was estimated at $153 a ton, based upon steel at 4¼ cents. He never objected at that time. They were both there asking for appropriations just as large as they could get, and they based their requests upon statements made that the cost would be $153 a ton. In that connection, also, they made a request that power be given to the President to commandeer all the shipping yards in the United States and take over every ship upon every way and in every yard in the United States. They also stated that they had reached an agreement with the British Government that the 1,024,000 tons of shipping under construction in the yards of the United States for England would be transferred to the United States at a cost of $185 a ton. Now the Senator from California says that Mr. Balfour graciously offered to transfer the English ships under construction in this country to the United States.

Mr. PHELAN. Excuse me, the Senator is quoting Mr. Denman.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. Denman, I should have said; excuse me. Why, Mr. President, if the Senator will remember, I called attention to this very question on the floor of the Senate when the appropriation bill was under discussion. I said that it could not be defended as a business proposition. I called the attention of the Senate to the fact that if England continued the construction of those ships and retained the ownership of them they would go into the very same trade and take their chances of being sunk by a submarine the same as they would if the United States advanced $200,000,000 and had the ships transferred to her.

Mr. STONE. And took the responsibility ourselves.

Mr. SMOOT. And we take the responsibility ourselves.

Mr. STONE. I want to say that I do not object to the building of wooden ships if, in the judgment of the Government, it is very important to build them for temporary use; but I hope that as few of them will be built as possible and that the ships we build will be permanent ships. I want to ask my friend from Utah if it is true that somebody—Gen. Goethals or some one else in authority—proposed to pay to the manufacturers furnishing the steel one hundred and fifty-odd dollars per ton. Is that true?

Mr. SMOOT. I understand that that figure——

Mr. STONE. Tentatively it was agreed to?

Mr. SMOOT. It was tentatively agreed to, and I will also say to the Senator that I understand, but I have no evidence to prove it, that the Shipping Board has contracted to pay $153 per ton for steel-constructed ships.

Mr. STONE. Who has paid it?

Mr. SMOOT. The Shipping Board has agreed to pay it and have contracted to pay as high as $133 per ton for ships constructed of wood. I say that I have not seen the contracts, and I do not know that such is the case.

Mr. STONE. I wish to get the judgment of my friend from Utah, who is a very thoughtful investigator of facts, whether he thinks our Government ought to pay one hundred and fifty-odd dollars per ton for steel or $133 per ton for the construction of a wooden vessel—that is per ton, I imagine he means; that whatever the tonnage is, it is $133 per ton.

Mr. SMOOT. Per ton displacement.

Mr. STONE. Per ton displacement; yes. I would like the Senator to say whether he thinks these prices are reasonable or whether they are exorbitant. If they are reasonable, that is the end of it; but if they are exorbitant, what is the remedy? I am laying as a basis the price the Navy Department is paying for steel, $56 per ton, as against one hundred and fifty-odd dollars per ton. What does the Senator think about that?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I can not defend the price of $95 per ton for steel. I think that was altogether too high, and so did Gen. Goethals think it was too high. As to the price of $153 per ton displacement for steel ships and $133 per ton displacement for wooden ships, I will say that I am unable to determine in my mind whether it is an extravagant price under conditions as they exist to-day. We all know that before the war and in ordinary times it cost to build steel ships in this country about $48 per ton displacement.

Mr. STONE. About that.

Mr. SMOOT. We know now, Mr. President, that wages in the shipping plants of the country have not only doubled but in many cases trebled. We know that everything that goes into the construction of a ship and all the parts that make up a ship have increased from 50 per cent to 500 per cent. I am not sufficiently well informed to state that the prices at which the contracts are being let are excessively high; but I do know that Mr. Denman recommended and the Senate gave the President the power to take over the British ships that were being built in this country and pay $185 per ton for them, plus whatever it would cost per ton to hasten their construction.

Mr. STONE. Were those steel ships?

Mr. SMOOT. They were all steel ships.

Mr. WEEKS. I think the Senator from Utah ought to take into consideration the fact that, based upon shipping rates to-day, the Government or any person having ships constructed could better afford to pay $95 per ton for steel than to pay $45 per ton in ordinary times; and, moreover, if the cost to manufacture the steel is not more than $45 or $50 a ton, the Government is going to receive back in excess-profits tax substantially one-half the difference between the cost and the price which it pays for the steel.

Mr. SMOOT. We must all recognize that, Mr. President, and when we begin to talk about prices and what commodities sell for to-day we must remember that these are not normal times. All business principles applicable in ordinary times are set aside.

I do not want to take any more time of the Senate, but I express the hope now that the quarrel between Mr. Denman and Gen. Goethals, so far as bringing it to the Senate is concerned, will end to-day. There is no good that can come from it.

Mr. STONE. They are both out.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; they are both in private life, and out of the positions to which they were appointed by the President of the United States.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, August 16, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

Harding	McNary	Reed

Mr. KING. I desire to announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], and the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] are detained from the Senate on official business.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. HUGHES], who is detained from the Senate on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. KIRBY. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. ROBINSON] and ask that this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of sickness. He has a pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. MCNARY. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] on account of official business.

Mr. MARTIN. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] is detained from the Senate on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. GRONNA, Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. POMERENE, Mr. WADSWORTH, and Mr. WILLIAMS answered to their names when called.

Mr. ASHURST, Mr. KING, Mr. STERLING, Mr. SHIELDS, Mr. WALSH, and Mr. KNOX entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

RECENT DISTURBANCES IN EAST ST. LOUIS, ILL.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I want to express my gratitude to the able Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], who had intended occupying the floor this morning, for giving way to me at this time. I wish to ask the indulgence of the Senate while I submit a few observations on Senate concurrent resolution No. 10, providing for an investigation of the mob violence and recent social disturbances at East St. Louis, Ill.

Mr. President, the subject matter of this resolution touches the very heart of our civilization. The blood currents that course throughout the body, imparting vigor and strength, are no more essential to the health of the body than a right understanding and proper treatment by the Congress of this profound and well-nigh insoluble problem is to the permanency of American institutions and the continued mental and moral superiority of our civilization. To consider so grave and important a matter lightly or investigate superficially the underlying causes which brought about the regretable, though comparatively trifling, incident in our Nation's history, which it is the purpose of this resolution to investigate, will be unfortunate in the extreme. A correct diagnosis is an indispensable prerequisite to the proper treatment of a social disease as well as a physical disorder. The spirit of lawlessness manifested by those who participated in the conflict between the white and the black people in the city of East St. Louis, Ill., a few days ago was but the symptom of a social distemper originating with and growing out of racial antagonism which is as profound and unchangeable as the eternal law of gravitation itself. Regretable in one sense, yes; very regretable; but on the other hand, in a sense, fortunate, in the fact that it is the outward expression, cruel and brutal though it may be, of that inward, dominant, and dauntless spirit of the white man, which would prefer death rather than surrender its superiority or yield in any way any of its rights or privileges, industrial or political, to the less favored and congenitally inferior race. It is the manifestation of that old quality of Caucasian race pride which has stood guard with drawn sword to preserve the purity of the Caucasian race—prolific and puissant—to which we are indebted for the literature of the Anglo-Saxon and Teutonic peoples, for the vast discoveries in science, for the form of government under which we live; in a word, for all the glories, all the advantages, which pertain to and characterize the civilization of the English-speaking and kindred branches of peoples. Dr. William Benjamin Smith, of Tulane University, discussing the necessity for keeping apart the races and preserving the purity of the Caucasian blood, wisely observes:

> If the race barrier be removed and the individual standard of personal excellency be established, the twilight of this century will gather about a nation hopelessly sinking into the mire of mongrelism.

Would that those words might be burned ineffaceably upon the tablets of your memories, my fellow Senators, that you might take them with you, ruminate them, and teach them to your children and your children's children until the lesson shall become an instinct of the race. We are threatened in America with the deleterious effects of the "melting pot" of war, the merging of the races, and the enforced equality and solidarity of citizenship. The suggestion is monstrous and only shows how brutalizing is war and stupefying its influences. Let it not be forgotten, Mr. President, that political equality in a country where the races are practically equal in number means ultimately social equality; social equality is universally followed by race amalgamation; race amalgamation means race deterioration, and with race deterioration will come the final disaster, the blighting touch of disintegration, downfall, and death of our civilization. There is enough of this black virus in the body politic of America to-day, in the orderly processes of time, to mongrelize her entire population.

Mr. President, it is an historical fact that will not be denied by an impartial student of history that no mongrel race has ever created anything of value or maintained a stable form of government very long. You have but to take a panoramic view of the marvelously fertile countries to the south of us on this hemisphere to be convinced of the accuracy of that statement. I believe that I am clearly within the limits of historical truth when I say that the civilizations of the past that arose to world domination through Caucasian initiative, effort, and genius disappeared as the result of the insidious contaminating influence of mongrelism.

Mr. President, this is no time for temporizing with fundamentals. It is true that the world is involved in brutal, destructive warfare—a war that is a reproach to Christian civilization, an outrage against humanity, and gives the lie to our pretended faith in the Prince of Peace. Everything is abnormal to-day, and the mental vision of the captain on the bridge even is dimmed with the mist and smoke of the conflict. The unusual is happening on every hand, and new issues continually arise in our pathway to challenge the genius of the American statesman and test the quality of his patriotism. The greater the danger to fundamental principles the greater the necessity for increasing the guard and considering maturely and cautiously everything that may affect our peculiar polity and the social well-being of the American people after the war is over. I submit that when we are preparing for war, making ready for conducting a war, it is highly prudent and the part of wise statesmanship to also prepare and be ready to overcome and correct the evils that invariably grow out of war.

Every student of history realizes that war is a veritable "Pandora's box" of economic irregularities and social perplexities.

When the cyclone passes through a country, lifting houses from their foundations and razing cities to the earth, the old order of things is seldom restored in the wake of the storm. New conditions suggest new ideas, re-formation takes the place of restoration, the old landmarks disappear and behold, all things are new. Just so it is with the ravages and innovations of war upon the government of a country. No government was ever the same after a war that it was before the war. In our own country there have been many changes and a gradual concentration of power and withdrawal of authority from the people since the middle of the last century.

When the Stars and Bars trailed in the dust of defeat on that fateful day at Appomattox government by free consent, as it was dreamed of by the founders of this Republic, was laid away in the charnal house of dead issues.

In that fateful conflict the pride of empire triumphed over the constitutional right of the people to prescribe their own form of government. The court of might gave an interpretation to the Constitution which was never dreamed of by the wise men who wrote that immortal document. I will not stop to discuss the question as to whether or not that interpretation will be best for America in years to come. I am sure the liberation of the southern white man from the incubus of negro slavery was a step forward and upward, but as to whether the changes wrought by the war will preserve the peace, enhance the happiness of our people, and promote the permanency of free institutions, time alone will tell.

> Ye friends to truth, ye statesmen who survey
> The rich man's joys increase, the poor's decay,
> 'Tis yours to judge how wide the limits stand
> Between a splendid and a happy land.

Mr. President, I am profoundly impressed with the fact that never in the history of this Republic was there so great a demand for brave, patriotic, and unselfish men in the councils of this Nation as at the present time—men with capacity to think for themselves, think for the benefit of their constituents and the American people, and after thinking dare to express and act their thoughts. "Do the things that others pray." The political charlatan who glories in servile subserviency, prides himself on shining in a reflected light, attains undue prominence in abnormal times such as the present, when public attention is centered upon greater issues, and the consideration of many things prevents the concentration of thought upon the individual actors upon the stage. Under such circumstances this character, this social excrescence, is developed, enters the arena of American politics, wins ephemeral fame and place as a reward of his self-abasement—the contemptuous concession made to him by his master as the price of his ignominy. It is unfortunate, but that type of creature may be expected to take advantage of the opportunities which unsettled conditions afford to push himself forward and ply his nefarious trade in this hour of our Nation's peril. Every nation at some time in its history unfortunately produces its Herostratus, whose vaulting vanity and insane selfishness are ever ready to touch the torch to the Ephesian dome. There are men in America to-day, who under the dishonest guise of loyalty to the administration, would abolish the Constitution and upon the ruins of this Republic erect a monarchy if they thought there was a chance of becoming a favored flunky in the court of the king.

> Down all the stretch of hell to its last gulf there is no shape more terrible than this.

There will also be found in large droves the patriots for pelf, whose cupidity is cloaked in patriotism, along with the statesmen in pursuit of power for personal ends. The disastrous consequences which inevitably flow from such sources, if not checked, will impose a burden upon posterity whose blighting influences will extend beyond the life of our civilization itself. They are in truth and in fact—or any other subterfuge or excuse that may serve their sinister purposes.

> Such as do build their faith upon
> The holy text of pike and gun—

Mr. President, I can not this morning perform a greater service to my country than to give warning, put the brand of disapproval, the stigma of deserved infamy, on every such character that the patriotic, unsuspecting, slow-thinking common people may know them and that they may be warned against their seductive, misleading, and sinister sophistry.

My attention has been called of late to a peculiar species of embryonic statesmen, the spawn and product of the slime-covered pools of war, the evolution from the human microbe, which found its origin in the troubled womb of abnormality. There is found on every hand these days robust specimens of this runty genus, which I mention only because such as they present a problem with which the people must deal—men with ambition but without the slightest capacity for independent thought or intelligent action, fit only to follow and fawn at the feet of power. This type of individual, I repeat, is one of the many tantalizing incidents of war, which but adds to the burden that the people must bear. One of these little individuals, to which my attention has been called, is incubating an ambition to serve his country or rather himself in the halls of State. He favors war, and is loud and lusty in the protestations of his loyalty to his country. He holds that under certain circumstances it is treason to even obey the Constitution in the prosecution of the war. He would suspend the Bill of Rights, abrogate the Sermon on the Mount, repeal the Golden Rule, and vest with the Commander in Chief of the Army the power of life and death over the people. His lip patriotism is preached from every street corner and he is known and heard ad nauseam by his friends. The valiance of his soul is made manifest upon every stump upon which he is permitted to stand and make profert of the shallowness of his mind and the emptiness of his heart, while he fills the ears of the patient-waiting, long-suffering populace with his meaningless verbigerations. This peculiar type of American statesmen, the legitimate product of illegitimate conditions, the pest and provocation of patient patriotism, is shown up in all its nakedness, in the light of his own explanation, or analysis, which he makes while hesitating to enter the arena of politics. He declines to announce his platform until it shall have been made certain how the people will look upon the declaration of war—and, by way of parenthesis, let me say the declaration of war about which the people were not consulted—and how they will finally regard the un-American and questionable Constitutional manner of raising an army for foreign service by conscription.

Mr. President, such a spectacle is disappointing in the extreme to the patriotic citizen, and is enough to sicken the soul of an outlaw or shock the moral sensibilities of a pirate to behold the thing, with the fire of patriotism burning upon his mendacious lips, eyes illumined by the meretricious glare of dramatic fervor, as he announces:

> I will wait until American blood begins to flow in the trenches of France—when the youth of this country shall be offered to the god of war on the battle fields of blood-soaked Europe. I will wait until America becomes drenched with the tears of broken-hearted mothers, sorrowing wives, and orphaned children—until the groans of grief shall fill the air with the solemn wail of the bruised and dying heart. Then—> will the war spirit burst forth from the hearts of the American people, and the sentiment for war will sweep over this country as the consuming flames sweep the forests of the arid West.

Just think of it, Mr. President! Imagine, if you can, the monster that would speculate in the blood of his countrymen, capitalize disaster, profit in broken hearts and the scalding tears that fall from the eyes of loving wives, orphaned children, sorrowing mothers and sisters! Think of playing politics with immortal souls! Such a creature will win for himself an eminence of infamy which will make the reputation of the notorious regal fiddler of ancient Rome pale into nothingness—the harmless act of a royal lunatic.

How often in these days of stress and trial am I reminded of the wise words of Edmund Burke. O God, that the American people might hear and understand.

> War suspends the rule of moral obligations, and what is long suspended is in danger of being totally abrogated. Civil wars strike deepest of all into the manners of the people. They vitiate their politics; they corrupt their morals; they pervert even the natural taste and relish of equity and justice. By teaching us to consider our fellow creature in a hostile light the whole body of our Nation becomes less dear to us. The very names of affection and kindness which were the bonds of charity whilst we agreed become now incentives to hatred and rage when the communion of our country is dissolved.

The effect of a world war is the same.

Mr. President, to paraphrase the language of one of America's greatest men, "We are living, we are dwelling, in a grand and awful time, in an age on ages telling—to be reasonable, resolute, patriotic, and loyal to ourselves and the fundamental principles of our Government is sublime." We are going to win this war. There is not the slightest doubt about it. Nobody has ever questioned that fact for a moment; but in the interests of humanity I trust that the "common sense of most" may triumph and those who are now engaged in the bloody conflict may be brought back to sanity, to realize the utter foolishness of war, and that an early and permanent settlement shall be effected. This is not a war between the masses of the people—they are mere pawns; but rather a quarrel between ambitious and heatrless rulers, encouraged and instigated in many instances by the commercial bandit and human cormorant who grow rich and fatten upon the spoils of war.

But whether early or late. I repeat, we are going to win the war, and after we shall have won it the thing that concerns me most is that we may be able to restore old principles and steer the old ship of state back to the moorings of the fathers. I believe that preserving free government in America will be about as difficult a problem then as to overcome our chief cruel and brutal antagonist, the German Empire, now.

I trust that Senate concurrent resolution No. 10, which has been reported from the committee, may be agreed to, and then I hope the committee appointed to investigate will be composed of men who will bring to the undertaking singleness of purpose and eliminate from their hearts and minds all sectionalism and preconceived notions, all racial prejudices which taint the spirit and warp the judgment. I hope they will go into the subject with the sole purpose of discovering the truth and, when the truth shall be discovered, report it to the Congress for the benefit of the American people.

Mr. President, I realize that there is an obligation imposed upon the white man of this country to the negro, and it is a duty that must be performed intelligently, inspired by the highest spirit of altruism. We all understand that the negro is in this country without his will or consent. He was brought here to gratify the greed and cupidity of the white man—the Anglo-Saxon white man—whose dealings with an inferior race or with an antagonist are always characterized by a cruelty as conscienceless as a cancer and a greed for gain as insatiable as death.

The negro is entitled to a square deal at the hands of the white man, but let us not misunderstand what a square deal means. Do not forget that you are not dealing with an individual, but with the race. Remember also that we are not legislating for the present generation only, but for posterity as well. It is just as foolish to give the negro equal political privileges with the white man in the management of this Government as it would be for an indulgent father to give his crying babe a bottle of poison just because the foolish little creature wanted it. A sickly sentimentality and an imprudent spirit of altruism must not sway our judgment in dealing with this vital question.

Mr. President, I repeat, this subject is too deep and varied, too far-reaching in all of its relations, for me to undertake to discuss it exhaustively to-day. It is not the time nor the occasion. There are as many phases to this problem and points of vital moment to the American people, which ultimately the American people must solve if America shall be saved, as the pebbles of the sea are many formed.

The chief and almost insuperable barrier in the pathway to the solution of this problem is the colossal prejudice, the dangerous indifference, the unfathomable ignorance of the subject which some of the so-called great statesmen and reputed great men of our day and generation candidly admit. These learned men may be able to tell you all about ancient history and the sciences—they may be able to travel with you among the stars and trace their courses—they may discourse learnedly upon the nebula hypothesis and venture an opinion as to the topography and political economy of the planet Mars, but they will placidly confess to you that they know absolutely nothing about the great race problem in America, regarding it as only a southern question, local in its application, and out of the depths of their confessed agnosticism on the subject will tell you there is no danger which can possibly grow out of it. For the ultimate good of the American people and as an influence which will hasten the final solution of the problem, I am glad the issue has moved farther north, which will enable our northern brethren to study the question at first hand. I shall not be surprised to see a very radical change take place in the minds of some of my northern brethren after they shall have been brought face to face to this great question, and those who have found it difficult in days gone by to do scant justice to the southern white man in dealing with the negro will be inclined, I am sure, to look with more intelligent tolerance upon our common efforts to solve this national problem. And I desire to say that this is as national in all of its elements as any problem that ever emanated from the "pregnant womb of time."

Now, Mr. President, Disraeli, the great English statesman, has said that "ignorance never settled a question," and I might also add that ignoring a question will never settle it. This great problem has been the sport and plaything of the cheap, shallow-minded, unscrupulous politicians for the past half century. A great wrong thereby has been done the negro, but a greater injury has resulted to the Nation.

There are more than 12,000,000 of these dark-skin people in the United States, and, while they sprang from the oldest of the races, there is not an instant in all the world's history where they have as a race ever shown in any marked degree sustained power of self-development. You can judge of the future only by what has been accomplished in the past. The truth is, the only safe and reliable light we have to illuminate our pathway in the darkness of the future shines out from the experiences of the past. Springing indigenous to the most fertile section of the globe, the negro has never written a language. He has never built a monument, created a civilization, or added one truth to the sum total of human intelligence. "The negro started neck and neck with the Egyptian in the valley of the Nile. He helped to build the temple of Rameses, polish the columns of Karnak, he toiled at the hundred gates of Thebes, but he gained no more conception of those colossal works than did the donkey who helped to drag the stone. He touched with his hands, he heard with his ears, with his eyes he beheld material things about him, but no comprehension of the spirit which reared these massive monuments ever penetrated his skull." To the voices that spoke to enlightened ears through chiseled stone and painted canvas his ears were dead and his eyes were blind.

There are individual cases, usually those wherein the "Anglo-Saxon reenforcement predominates," where breadth of intellectual vision and accomplishment compare favorably with members of the white race, but that is only in individual cases It is an historical fact which will not be denied by a serious student of history that the civilization imparted by the white man to the negro—and the negro has had no other civilization save that imparted to him by the white man—lasts only so long as the negro is under the domination of the white man who inculcated it. When left to himself, the negro as a race has universally retrograded to the barbarisms of the jungles. The call of the wild invariably overcomes the lure of civilization and the quest of knowledge is given up for the ease and indolence of the primitive state. There is one thing certain, proven by time and trial: The two races can not live together on terms of social and political equality.

Mr. President, there is another truth which I wish in passing to impress upon the Senate and the American people. It is this:

The use of firearms and the placing of the ballot in the hands of the negro in a white man's country are inconsistent with good government, good order, and good feeling between the races. The outcome of such an experiment and any effort to make it a permanent policy under our form of government will inevitably lead to disaster. It is a lamentable fact, and one we should be prepared to meet, that one of the horrible problems which will grow out of this unfortunate war, which the southern white people particularly must meet and overcome, is the training as a soldier which the negro will receive. Impress the negro with the fact that he is defending the flag, inflate his untutored soul with military airs, teach him that it is his duty to keep the emblem of the Nation flying triumphantly in the air—it is but a short step to the conclusion that his political rights must be respected, even though it is necessary for him to give his life in defense of those rights, and you at once create a problem far-reaching and momentous in its character. It is known to all fair-minded men who have given intelligent thought and careful consideration to this question that political equality between the white and black races in the Southern States of this Republic will not and can not be tolerated if the white man's civilization shall be preserved there. Equality at the ballot box means negro domination, with all the horrors that the term implies, and I am advised that this military experience in war is to be followed by compulsory military training. That is to be the program of the administration, we are told.

All of which, Mr. President, will create a problem which will be more hurtful and disastrous to the Southern States of this Republic, and therefore hurtful to America, because you cannot injure one State without injuring the whole sisterhood of States, more difficult of management than that which resulted from the war of 1861 and the immediate effects of the war of 1917. I have not language with which to express my unalterable opposition to such a policy. Let us hope that after the war fever may have abated and the excited brain of the American statesman has cooled we may be able to take a calmer view of the question before the fatal mistake is committed. May I be permitted, Mr. President, to say that it was a mistake, against which I warned the administration, when the President of the United States and the Congress called the negro of this country to arms. Senators who doubt the wisdom or justification of my views will become disillusioned if they will take the pains to read the experiences of other nations in dealing with this ponderous problem. I maintain that compulsory military training will leave a problem in this country more difficult of solution, more disastrous, I fear, in its consequences than the sudden emancipation of the slave a half century ago. God grant that the people may think and reason together and our statesmen may act before it is too late.

I appreciate the fact, Mr. President, that these suggestions will fall harshly upon ears that do not care to hear the truth on this subject. Some will listen patiently and look on with commiserating tolerance, while the pitifully despicable sycophant may rise to the height of pusillanimous parvanimity and protest against bringing forth this issue at this time, lest it may interfere with the conduct of the war. But I shall suffer the annoyance of the legislative gadfly rather than fail to perform my duty to my country. I despise the timeserver and the opportunist. The truth must be told. The American people must understand they must be put on guard before it is everlastingly too late.

I expect no assistance from the self-centered, vanity-inflated, dwarf-souled politician of the South at this time. The man who wants the approval of the commercialized metropolitan press, who prefers its false flattery to the consciousness of duty intelligently done will push the momentous question aside as unworthy or unnecessary of consideration at this time. I expect that. I shall be surprised if any other course shall be taken by the character of men I have described. That class of timeservers are more dangerous to the country than the pirate and far less admirable.

But, Mr. President, impressed with a sense of obligation to the people of America generally, and the people of Mississippi particularly, and the responsibility of my place in this Chamber, I am going to do my duty as God gives me to understand it. I want to again express the hope that in the consideration of this great question the magnanimous spirit of Thomas Jefferson and the lofty idealism of Abraham Lincoln shall be invoked. To the real earnest statesman with a vision, who desires to do right and serve his country best in the treatment of this gravest of twentieth century problems, I commend the teachings of Thomas Jefferson and Abraham Lincoln. It will be recalled that more than 100 years ago the sage of Monticello announced the irrefragable truth that "There is nothing truer written in the book of fate than that the negro will one day be free. It is equally true," he said, "that he can not live with the white man on terms of social and political equality." He urged the colonists to emancipate their slaves and send them back to Africa whence they came, saying, "You can solve this problem now without the sacrifice of a human life and with the outlay of a comparatively small amount of money. White men will take their places as laborers and the current of affairs will move on without a ripple. But if you wait until it forces itself on, human nature will shudder at the prospect held up."

With the eye of the prophet and the soul of the seer—

> He dipped into the future far as human eye could see:
> He saw the visions of the world and all the difficulties that would be.

He saw the War between the States, which cost billions of dollars and millions of men. He saw the blighted lives, the frustrated ambitions, the unhappy homes, and all the sadness and sorrow that follow in the wake of civil war. He saw the strife and turmoil, the internecine disturbances of the present day, the legitimate fruit of abnormal conditions, the cause for which this Congress is passing a resolution to consider and investigate to-day.

A marvelous vision, inspired foresight, divine advice, which was thrown aside as mere verbal chaff by the temporizing, sordid, self-centered politician of that day, the unhappy prototype of some of the distinguished gentlemen who are winning prominence to-day by their loud, stupid, imprudent inanities.

A little more than a half century later the immortal Lincoln came along, the central figure in the greatest of civil wars. Not possessed of the book learning and erudition of Jefferson, but gifted with the divine afflatus which enabled him to know things without being able to give the source of his information—a God-given quality which permits one to "hear the ocean in one shell and see the whole world's winter in one leaf," Mr. Lincoln said, in the memorable debate between himself and Mr. Douglas, "I am not, and never have been, in favor of bringing about in any way the social and political equality of the white and black races; I am not, nor ever have been, in favor of making voters or jurors of negroes, nor of qualifying them to hold offices, nor of intermarrying with white people. And I will say in addition to this that there is a physical difference between the white and black races which I believe will forever forbid the two races living together on terms of social and political equality. And inasmuch as they can not so live while they do remain together, there must be the positions of superior and inferior, and I, as much as any other man, am in favor of having the superior position assigned to the white race." A correct understanding of Mr. Lincoln's words is absolutely indispensable to a proper comprehension of the issue involved in this great question.

It was the dream of Jefferson and the hope of Lincoln that physical segregation of the races might be brought about for the good of both races. That was not done when easy of accomplishment; therefore the dangers and difficulties which inevitably grow out of racial contact must be mitigated by absolute social and political segregation by law.

That can be accomplished by perfecting the constitutional makeshifts that were added to the organic laws by methods questionable even to this day, measures that grew out of the hates generated by the war, and proposed to serve sinister political ends. This great work the present generation is called upon to do, not in spirit of antagonism nor racial hatred, I repeat, but rather in a spirit of love for the salvation of the black man as well as for the preservation of the white man's civilization. The two races can not live together on terms of social and political equality. What is true of the black man and the white man is also true of the yellow man in the Western States. For the good of all the races the white man must rule this Republic and he must rule it absolutely.

But, Mr. President, I do not desire to go further into this question just now. I shall have more to say on the subject at some future day, when I hope to place before the Senate facts that will convince.

I am going to ask permission to print as a part of my remarks some historical data prepared by him and taken from the manuscript of a book of great merit now in press, by Mr. Ernest Sevier Cox, of Knoxville, Tenn., entitled "Decay of Culture: A Study of the Negro in Civilization."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"ARMING THE COLORED RACES.

"Some 6,000 years of history are at the disposal of the student of the color problem. The advisability or the inadvisability of any proposed measure dealing with America's colored races may be tested by these 60 centuries of experience.

"The outstanding fact of the centuries of the contact of races is that neither the white man nor his civilization has survived prolonged contact with a colored race. Keane, the eminent British ethnologist, repeatedly asserts that amalgamation of races is the ultimate result of the contact of races. Possibly none will question the assertion that the reason that civilization has not survived contact with a colored race is that the white man, the founder of all civilizations, has never remained white when in contact with the colored.

"Civilization, in both its spiritual and physical phases, proceeds from the white race, and as the blood of the colored gradually absorbed by the white qualifies the white the change in race is reflected by a change in culture. The white race as white progresses, but slowly mixed with the blood of a colored race the white man does not progress. His culture becomes stagnant and tends to recede. The culture of a race is reflective of the mentality of the race. Mentality depends upon brain quantity and quality. Brain quantity and quality possess immediate and inseparable relation to breed, are subject to the laws of heredity, and are qualified genetically. Environment conceivably may qualify a race, improving it or degrading it, but save where environment influences genetics its effects are too remote to have consideration in practical politics.

"We know that the three fundamental groups of mankind—white, yellow, and black—have not changed relatively in race type or culture during the past 6,000 years, and there is no reason to believe that they have so changed during the past 50,000 years. At the dawn of civilization the white race was in cultural ascendency, just as it is to-day. Any seeming advancements of the colored races have not been those arising as results of natural or sexual selection, but by reason of the colored races acquiring the cultural creations of the white. The culture of the white man affects the individuals of the colored races, not the races themselves. The physical organisms determining race may be affected congenitally only. Whether culture increases or recedes it leaves race unaffected.

"This conclusion is based upon the many instances in the history of the contact of races in which the white race has implanted a civilized culture among the colored and the culture not survived the white race.

"The Caucasian is the creative race. The steps in cultural progress have, without exception, been determined by the creative efforts of the white man. None have come from the colored. We formerly attributed certain inventions to the inhabitants of eastern Asia, but now we know that these cultural innovations were imparted to them. Both ethnology and history tell us that blond Caucasians were beyond the great wall in China centuries before Christ. Such creative contributions to the culture of civilization as steam, steel, and electricity, and the germ theory in medical science are readily accredited to the white man. As these contributions mark later Caucasian history do other contributions as the domestication of plants and animals, the building of ships and great stone temples; the advancement wrought through the use of polished stone, copper, and bronze implements mark the cultural activities of the early Caucasian.

"As a result of his restlessness and resourcefulness the early white man advanced into and dominated the colored races in large portions of the ancient world just as the later Caucasian has made his dominion world wide. The easiest, as it is the safest, way to appreciate the results of race contact in early history is to observe the results of later race contact. In the measure in which the white French perished in Haiti other whites in contact with the colored have perished. In the manner in which the civilization of the whites in Haiti was replaced by the resurgence of West African fetishism other cultures of the white man have disappeared.

"He who grasps the meaning of Haitian history grasps as well the meaning of the history of Egypt, Abyssinia, Nigeria, Uganda, and Mashonaland in Africa; India, Persia, southern Arabia, Cambodia, Ceylon, and entire Polynesia in Asia. These countries possessed relatively high cultures founded by Caucasian peoples. As the whites in modern Haiti were eliminated by miscegenation and exterminated by colored soldiers equipped with the white man's arms, so were the whites eliminated in the early civilizations in contact with colored races.

"The noncreative races relying upon their own resources are not a serious menace to the white man and the institutions of civilization. But when the white man has armed the colored with the white man's most destructive agencies of warfare and thus bridged the cultural chasm between the races the white man has times without number been destroyed by the colored whom he has armed. Fifty centuries ago the white Pharaohs of Egypt enlisted African negroes by the tens of thousands for use in the Egyptian armies.

"Their use as mercenaries became so extensive and permanent that the Egyptian word for soldier is derived from the name of a powerful negro tribe of the cataract regions. Black women in the harems and black men in the armies corrupted the blood and weakened the fiber of the founders of the Egyptian civilization. Culture decayed. Negroid troops placed a mulatto upon the throne of the once great Pharaohs six centuries before Christ. Prior to the absorption of negro blood the Egyptian people were foremost in the arts of civilization, but negroid Egypt has not in the space of 30 centuries made a contribution to civilization.

"As civilized culture—that from domestication of plants and animals to the application of steam and electricity—has arisen from the white race and the colored races have profited greatly as a result of the impartation to them of this culture it would seem that a chief object of the colored should be to keep the white man white. But throughout history this has not been the object of the colored. Rather the colored have sought by all measures possible to them to effect amalgamation with the whites. Where the whites have refused to mix their blood with the colored the latter have in every instance sought to exterminate the whites. It was the disgruntled mixbreeds of Haiti who, refused equality with the whites, caused the massacre of the whites. White Haiti perished in the attempt to stay the mixing of the races in Haiti. Give to the colored man full and unrestricted privileges to the white man's homes and to the white man's daughters and he becomes an ally of the white man. Deny him either and he becomes a bitter enemy of the white man. If he have no means by which to wreak his vengeance, he will become sullenly defiant, but if means for securing redress for the ostracism he suffers be at his disposal he will not hesitate to use such means.

"Spain and Portugal, in the settlement of South America, formulated programs of miscegenation, encouraging the whites to intermarry with the colored races found there and with the African negroes imported there, that racial harmony be secured and a homogeneous population produced. North America remained white. Large portions of Latin America became hybrid. Latin America purchased peace at the price of Caucasian purity. But it was a temporary peace merely. The instability of mongrel character has determined the frequency of Latin American revolutions. The numerous white tyrants have risen to power by reason of the bayonets of colored soldiers. Unscrupulous white leaders have had but to promise the colored troops equality with the residue of whites to secure a following. The history of the Latin American countries should be a sufficient protest against miscegination and the arming of colored races.

"It is futile to deny that there is in the minds of the southern negroes an abiding belief that the whites of the rest of the Union stand ready to support them in their desire for equality. They hold this view in spite of the ofttimes-attested fact that the whites of the rest of the Union are as averse to any essential equality of whites with blacks as are the whites of the South. But this belief is a potent consideration and should have great weight in determining the expediency of arming the blacks. Through this belief the negro will reason that he shall receive assistance from the whites of the North at the moment he strikes for his theory of equality forcefully with arms.

"There are those who will say that the arming of the negro will not be a danger and need not be a terror, save to those whites who are oppressing the negro. The measure of such oppression is generally understood to be the degree in which the whites withhold equality from the blacks. That the whites in contact with the negro oppose sharing control of a civilization whose every heartbeat is Caucasian with the Negro is judged by some to be 'oppression.' 'Equality,' as we must use the term, is defined by the Federal Constitution. It is an equality conferred upon the negro by constitutional amendments. It is an artificial equality. It is created by the Federal Constitution and that instrument is available for its enforcement. Heretofore in American history the ideal has been to secure constitutional privileges by constitutional measures, and none have advocated civil war to secure a privilege which may be obtained by law.

"Those who believe that the arming of the negro will, by virtue of the bayonet, enable the negro to secure 'equality' and that the armed negro will be a danger to none save his 'oppressors' are guilty of a twofold fallacy in obtaining their conclusion. The first is the belief that the armed black may by reason of his arms intimidate the South. Knowledge of the reconstruction and the succeeding period should be convincing upon this point.

"The second fallacy is the believing that the armed blacks will not sooner or later turn their arms upon the whites, whatever the attitude of the whites toward the negro may be. This fallacy is based upon a misapprehension of negro race traits and an ignorance of negro history. It does not take into consideration the negro's lust for blood. Those who hold it have never heard of Dingaan, Moselekatse, or Metsa. They know nothing of the Dahomey revelings in human gore and are innocent of knowledge of the Zulu's destruction of a million of his own race before his merciless hand was stayed by the European; neither are they aware that the best efforts of the British and other Europeans governing Africa have proved unsuccessful in stamping out cannibalism, nor that the Haitian negro, after massacring the whites, turned with his pristime lust for blood upon his own people.

"The trust of the sentimentalist that the influences of civilization has weaned the American negro from his race instincts seems strangely out of place when at this time the President of the United States, in an address to Congress, includes the statements 'The present German submarine warfare against commerce is a warfare against mankind,' and the object of the United States in entering the war 'is to vindicate the principles of peace and justice in the life of the world as against selfish and autocratic power.' If the great German people, foremost in the arts and sciences and heirs to the centuries of Christian teaching, have reverted to primitive Teutonic bloodlettings, is it not difficult to believe that the short period of the Negro's dwelling with the Caucasian has alienated him from his primitive instincts? This is a pertinent question for those who favor the arming of the negro.

"The arming of the negro will transform the negro. As he grasps the bayonet his primitive passions will be revived and his race taught an eternal antipathy to the whites, an antipathy as potent in the breast of the negro as in the breast of the whites, will increase, and in this instance he will have the white man's arms with which to strike the white man. He will not realize that gunpowder, steel, and Army tactics are the contribution of the Caucasian, but in the possession of them will feel the equal of the Caucasian. He will be afflated through the consciousness that gunpowder levels races as well as individuals and seek to measure armed strength with that race with which he can not compete in peaceful measures.

"The negro will not consider that his acts of armed aggression will bring disaster to his own race. The impulse of the moment and not decision based upon a consideration of consequence will rule the negro as it has in all ages and in all lands. The rapist does not consider the consequence either to himself or to those of his race. The race no more than the individual will consider consequences when primal emotion is aroused. When the negro opposes the whites by force of arms it is not for the purpose of subduing the whites but for the desire to exterminate the whites. African wars generally have been marked by the destruction of the vanquished who were not fit for slavery. Against his own race the negro appears to exact life for the sheer purpose of reveling in blood, but when he turns his arms upon the Caucasian he has an added incentive to destroy. He can not compete with the Caucasian, and this alone makes it imperative to slay the Caucasian. In Haiti he spared neither age nor sex. As he can not subjugate the white, he seeks to exterminate them.

"We can not expect a gratitude to the whites for the culture of civilization he possesses to be a deciding factor in causing the negro to keep the peace. English writers tell us that when the white man goes among the colored with his superior cultural possessions, the colored look upon the whites as gods. But generations of the colored grow up who are not conscious of the culture being alien in origin. These by reason of familiarity with the culture about them feel that in its possession they are the equals of the whites. The negro's demand for equality arises from this defect in his reasoning. That the civilization over which he seeks coordination of racial control proceeds from the white man has never seemed to affect the negro.

"The question of arming the American negro should be decided with regard to its probable effect upon the negro problem in its entirety. There are ineradicable issues produced by the contact of Negro and Caucasian. Race problems may be settled in but two ways. The races must be separated or amalgamated. No other solutions are possible. Jefferson foresaw that the one or the other of these solutions must be effected and so did Lincoln. Both Jefferson and Lincoln sought the separation of the races—sought to remove the negro from America.

"The matter of removal is not relevant at this period in our history save as removal may be a necessary step following upon armed conflicts of the races if arms are placed in the hands of the negroes. The expediency of arming the negro should then be considered in its relation to miscegination. In general terms it may be said that any measure recognizing the equality of races is promotive of the admixture of races. In the heart of the negro the equality he craves is social equality. Political and economic equality are empty and valueless if social equality is denied. In this matter the colored races are probably right, for it is certain that if the colored are entitled to one phase of equality, they are entitled to all. It is equally certain that if they are willingly accorded one phase of equality the other phases will not be long withheld.

"The United States have succeeded better in keeping the white man white when in contact with the colored than has any other nation in history. The 'color line' has been more potent and permanent in America than elsewhere. Within the period during which the whites of the Southern States have retained race purity other portions of the white race in contact with the colored have been lost through miscegenation. As the whites of the South have fought the battle for race purity and succeeded as no other people when in three centuries of contact with a colored race it would seem that a sentimental as well as a practical question may be asked those who seek to arm the negro in the South. The practical question should be, 'Is it a proper Government measure to arm the blacks when numerous instances of history attest that the blacks will use the white men's arms to destroy the whites?'

"The sentimental question may be stated in those terms of inquiry which seek to ascertain by what reason is there desire to impose this great danger upon the white South, which for three centuries has been true to race and the institutions of civilization. Is it no concern to the rest of the Nation that the South has been true to the trust of breed and culture? Add to the southern fear of the negro rapist an additional fear of the negro soldier, who at all times has been impudent and aggressive to the whites, and you will increase the race problem a hundredfold. Arm the negro, and however peaceful the beginning, it is but a question of time when he will turn United States arms against the whites, as he did at Brownsville, and toss white children upon the bayonet point, as he did in Haiti.

"Regardless of the terms of statement, the real purpose of American 'preparedness' is the strengthening of the Nation. Any measure of preparedness which is to endanger the peace and the welfare of large portions of the Union is false preparedness. Race instincts are as eternal as race, and they effect a cleavage in a nation which is deeper and more permanent than any form of government. Democracy does not eliminate race lines—it intensifies them. The British in the West Indies applied the theories of democratic equality to their problems of race, but quickly abandoned them and returned to the autocratic form of government. Englishmen there relinquished their charters of autonomy and reinstituted Crown control, preferring to be ruled by distant whites rather than share control with local blacks.

"Americans seek to minimize rather than magnify race differences. Unto the present time southerners seem to prefer to dwell upon the faithfulness of the war-time negro rather than the insolence of the negro of the reconstruction. It is right that we seek by all measures to repress racial antipathy. But in the grave matter of arming the negro it is not right to ignore fundamental race traits. The short eight years of the reconstruction in the South undid the work of two and a half centuries of slave discipline. Before the Civil War a negro who would have raped a white woman would have been lynched by members of his own race. Since the reconstruction and its attendant theories of equality the negro who rapes a white woman and escapes is looked upon as a racial hero, while if he is apprehended and lynched his race considers him a martyr.

"In 1908 there occurred in the city of Springfield, Ill. (the home place of Lincoln), race riots on a large scale. Assaults by black men upon white women so enraged a portion of the white population that mob retaliation was resorted to, as it had been in Atlanta, Ga., two years previous. Some negroes were lynched, one within a few blocks of the former home of Lincoln, while thousands were compelled to flee the city and were denied ingress into the adjoining towns. Is it not certain that if the principles of unracialized military service, such as those proposed in the present measures before Congress, had been in operation some 20 years before the Springfield riots and the city had abounded in negro soldiers and reservists, there would have been grave disorder resulting in much bloodshed, possibly in the destruction of the negroes throughout the State? And had such conflict occurred there, would not it have spread to other States? The negro problem is not solved in the United States; it is just beginning. Heretofore the lack of congestion has minimized race friction. The increasing millions of both races and their unavoidable struggle for survival will increase the race problem in a measure not possible under present conditions. Other problems confronting the Nation will be solved by the ordinary forces of progress. The negro problem is the only issue confronting America beyond which we can not see.

"A legal recognition of the race consciousness of the white man who lives apart from the great mass of the negroes crops out in the legislation of such States as Michigan and North Dakota, which have passed laws forbidding intermarriages between blacks and whites in these States, and in the recent defeat of the proposed legislation in the States of Ohio and Oregon which would have armed the blacks of these States as units in the National Guard.

"Is it likely that the white people of these States who, though living apart from the negro, yet are conscious of the ineradicable gravity of race contact have the desire, or if given voice would advocate, the arming of the massed millions of negroes in the Southern States? There is not the slightest doubt but that if the proposal for arming the negro were submitted to a vote of the American whites it would be overwhelmingly defeated, North as well as South.

"In the periods of nationalism there is a tendency to deify nationalism. It is right that there be. But when two races, differentiated as the Caucasian and the Negro, live in the same government, we know that race consciousness is deeper than national consciousness. The Civil War engendered a nationalism which in theory swept aside race lines. When peace was secured, race lines reasserted themselves. As the theory of equality of races grew out of the nationalism engendered by the Civil War, there is a danger of the present crisis and its attendant emphasis upon nationalism leading us to disregard fundamental race traits and enact legislation as unsatisfactory as that of the reconstruction.

"The success of democracy depends not alone upon the intellectual quality of its citizens but to a great degree upon the homogeneity of the fundamental or controlling instincts of its peoples. The black and the white possess in common the generalized human characters, but differ in their specializations. The white race is specialized along certain lines, the black race along others. It is the specialized characteristics of the white men from which civilization flows. The difference between the specialization of the Caucasian and the Negro constitutes the basic principles of the negro problem and gives it its unsolvable aspects. Race is deeper than any conceivable form of government—is ineradicable—and when present as a problem in democracy demands to be handled as a fact of the utmost importance. When races are in contact, measures of government ignoring race are doomed to failure. It is not decrying democracy, but is a tribute to the high intellectual qualities required in successful democracy to state that not democracy but autocracy is better suited for the successful handling of race problems if the races concerned are widely separated by the forces of evolution.

"While it may be shown clearly by the naturalist that race is ineradicable and can not be ignored, yet it is not the naturalist but the historian who gives us the better view of the matter. In telling one that race contact has always been accompanied by race conflict and has ended in either the separation or the amalgamation of the races the historian performs a more forceful service than the naturalist, for the historian deals with verifiable history while the naturalist bases his conclusions on facts that are not easily appreciated by the average man.

"It is a verifiable truth that race contact has been accompanied by race conflict. In the light of history the arming of the negro within the bounds of a white civilization can not but be regarded as a suicidal measure. Whenever and wherever tried it has caused unrest and ultimately led to conflict. Nor are the white nations of the world unaware of the danger of arming the colored races. Throughout the colonies of the nations of Europe there is everywhere evidence that this matter has been carefully considered. Under colonial laws the native races may bear arms, if at all, in very limited numbers and under the closest inspection and supervision. At present certain of the warring nations are using the African negro in large numbers, but these same powers show by their colonial laws that the use of the negro is for temporary purposes. In the Belgian Congo and the French territories of Africa it is customary to have the negro regiments used in policing these colonies stationed at a distance from their tribes.

"The white nation having a negro problem most like our own is the Union of South Africa. There every species of equality urged in Europe during the past century was applied and failed. Nine Kaffir wars were the cumulative answer to the British theory that 'equality' would solve race problems. The greatest peril confronting the new Government in South Africa is the Negro territory, Basutoland, in the very heart of the Union. There is not a person of European blood in South Africa, nor is it likely there is a Caucasian in the British Empire who would advocate the arming of the Basuto. Instead of arming these negroes within their Union, the present Government, and before it the colonial office, sought by all means to prevent arms reaching the Basuto. Police with special instructions to oppose 'gun running' over the border into Basutoland have been on duty for decades. The fear of the white population of the Union that the Basuto may have accumulated arms is the deepest and the most abiding fear that one hears expressed in South Africa.

"The numerical relation that the Basuto bears to the whites of South Africa is materially less than the proportion that the negro population of the South bears to the whites of the South. In certain large areas of the South the relative proportion would be as 20 to 1; that is, the negroes of these areas of the South are twenty times as numerous as the Basuto in relation to the number of whites in South Africa.

"It is not needful to go further in showing that it is the universal opinion of white colonials that the native races should not be armed. But perhaps it is expedient to state that many of the native races which the white man confronts in other parts of the world are by no means savage races. Some of them are the equals of the negro in America, while certain of them, as the Zulu, the Kosa, and perhaps the Basuto in South Africa and millions of the inhabitants of India, are the superiors of the American negro, if we measure the South African negro by his physique and the Indians by their culture.

"Race problems are ineradicable save by separation of the races or by their amalgamation. Race instincts and race interests do not change. The future of the white man in contact with the colored will be as the past. It will be marked by cleavage and discord. To arm the negro is but to provide the means and increase the certainty of race conflict, and from this there can be no escape. Unarmed, the negro, conscious of his helplessness, is not likely to disturb the peace. When armed he has always been the aggressor. Were the negroes of the South armed at the present time, would the South be secure while the agents of Germany are inciting them to revolt? No one familiar with the race traits and history of the negro will predict their constancy when they are led to believe in their armed success."

Mr. VARDAMAN. There is immense food for thought in Mr. Cox's work. I commend to the consideration of the Senate the data which I am inserting. It is well worth your while to read it. You will find the information he gives vital and important in leading you to a proper settlement of the great question with which you must deal, and you must deal with it whether you desire to do so or not.

Mr. Cox is an ethnologist by profession, and in addition to a thoroughly scholastic study of his subject he has devoted six years of world travel to the study of the question. His investigations extended into Asia, Africa, East and West Indies, together with a perfect familiarity with conditions in the United States. His knowledge is gotten at first-hand.

Mr. President, this is about all I have to say on the question at this time. If this resolution shall be agreed to, I want to again express the sincere hope that the committee appointed may be composed of men who will go deeply into the subject with the determination as far as human intellect can do so, unhindered and unembarrassed to investigate all the phases of the subject and report without fear of punishment or hope of reward, the truths discovered by such investigation.

History furnishes mileposts to point the way. As Edwin Markham says, in the Testimony of the Dust:

Voices are crying from the dust of Tyre,
From Karnak and the stones of Babylon—
"We raised our pillars upon self-desire,
And perished from the large gaze of the sun."

A grandeur looked down from the pyramid,
A glory came on Greece, a light on Rome;
But in them all the ancient traitor hid,
And so they passed like momentary foam.

There was no substance in their soaring hopes;
The voice of Thebes is now a desert cry;
A spider bars the road with filmy ropes,
Where once the feet of Carthage thundered by.

A bittern cries where once Queen Dido laughed;
A thistle nods where once the Forum poured;
A lizard lifts and listens on a shaft,
Where once of old the Colosseum roared.

It is a vision waiting and aware;
And you must draw it down, O men of worth—
Draw down the new Republic held in air,
And make for it foundations on the earth.

And that new Republic in America will be a government of white men by white men for all men.

WAR REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes.

Mr. BANKHEAD resumed and concluded the speech begun by him on yesterday. The entire speech is as follows:

Mr. President, the so-called war-tax provision of the pending bill is fundamentally wrong and works marked injustice to many sections and many industries.

The chief defense I have heard of its principle is the statement that it is fashioned after the English law. It does not, according to my information, follow the English law, in that it omits the highly important right to the taxpayer to select two out of three prewar years from which to secure an average normal profit. It is a well-known fact that all years are not normal years in business. In the wheat section and in the cotton section the weather often controls the production and thereby measures the business prosperity of all industries dependent on wheat or cotton. Labor strikes on railroads or in industrial plants, financial stringency, and depression in the markets where the products are sold, often cause subnormal profits.

Notwithstanding the fact that business conditions in Europe are absolutely stabilized as compared with ours, the English law recognizes this situation and allows the taxpayers to select two out of three years to secure an average prewar profit. So the best element of fairness in the English plan is eliminated under the terms of the pending bill.

But, Mr. President, the whole scheme is inapplicable to our conditions. It is theoretical entirely, and can not have a fair and just practical application to all sections of our country and to all of our diversified business interests.

The business of England, from hundreds of years' experience, has become stabilized. As a rule, the son succeeds the father and the business continues for generation after generation without interruption. Their financial system with the Bank of England as its chief corner stone does not undergo the strains and changes to which our system is subjected. They do not have periods of remarkable prosperity, as we do, followed by periods of depression and failures. It is peculiarly true that on the subject of normal or average profits, our conditions are so unlike that no real analogy can be drawn.

I admire England with her intelligence and her courage and her sense of justice, but I do not admire her with that blindness that would cause me to borrow from her a system of taxation that is inappropriate to our conditions and burdensome and unjust to many of our people, especially the small, struggling business units.

The advocates of the bill claim that it levies a tax on war profits. I deny that claim.

The tax is not based upon the amount of profits made as a result of the war but is based upon the exemption allowed the taxpayer. If a tax is to be laid upon supposed war profits, it should progress, increasing step by step with the amount of excess profits instead of increasing step by step with the increase of the percentage of the excess profits over the normal profits. In grading the tax on percentages of normal profits instead of on amounts of profits, there is manifest unfairness.

What are war profits?

The bill proceeds on the idea that all profits now made in excess of the average for the prewar period 1911, 1912, and 1913 are attributable absolutely, arbitrarily, and solely to the existence of the war and are therefore taxable as war profits. When the phrase "war profits" is used, the popular understanding is that it applies to munitions and ammunition and other factories which have manufactured and sold supplies to the allies at tremendous profits. The Bethlehem Steel and DuPont Powder being typical of this group of war brides. When the term "war profits" is used as a subject of taxation the public mind sees a picture of an overflowing treasury, filled by the fruits of foreign war contracts, and the taxation of such profits to help finance the war is justly expected by the American people. But, Mr. President, the people do not expect the popular phrase "war profits" to be capitalized and used as a means of unduly oppressing the small business units of the country. The proposed bill has that effect, as I shall undertake to demonstrate. I hope this subject will be approached by Senators with open minds, because it means so much to the continued prosperity of the country. The ability of the average and small business to finance itself and to produce to a high state of efficiency depends in large measure upon the settlement we make of the basis of taxation upon profits.

I ask again, What are war profits?

The advocates of the pending bill, after arbitrarily fixing a prewar period as a basis for normal profits, take no account of different conditions which prevailed during that period of years or during portions of that period in different sections of the country; they take no account of different conditions that prevailed in different lines of business in the same sections of our country; they take no account of improvements in machinery and other physical conditions; they refuse to consider improvements in skill, both in superintendence and labor, and increased knowledge of the business involved; they take no account of the experience gained by years of costly experiments; they turn a deaf ear to that valuable asset in so many businesses which can only be gained by years of experience, great expense, and continued fair dealing and good faith, viz, good will.

They reject the idea that since the period 1911 to 1913, inclusive, any business could better its condition and increase its earnings. They accept the doctrine that every business unit, except for the war, stands now where it stood then. They reject the known fact that in hundreds of places where two businesses were making about the same earnings during the prewar period that one business, by reason of more application, of better superintendence, of improvements in organization and discipline, by superior skill in operation, the use of new patents, better buying agencies, better judgment in credits, and many other considerations which enter into successful conduct of business, has caused that business during the intervening years to outstrip its competitor and earn a much larger profit solely by reason of its improved conditions and facilities; but the Finance Committee would arbitrarily tax all such additional earnings as war profits. That is not just. Any system of taxation which has such unfair and unequal application needs reexamination and readjustment.

The bill as presented includes not only corporations, but partnerships and individuals. As it passed the House, the bill did not include individuals, but they have been intentionally included by the Finance Committee.

What is the effect on the wheat farmer. During the prewar period the average price for his wheat was probably 75 cents per bushel. Now that we have guaranteed him $2 per bushel, and considering the increased production which will be thereby stimulated, as claimed by the friends of that measure, I beg to inquire if each wheat farmer will not make this year a substantial war profit? Let us see how it will affect him. Without attempting to state accurately the prices and costs during the prewar period, but using approximate figures for purposes of illustration, we will take the case of a wheat farmer who raised 10,000 bushels of wheat and sold it for 75 cents per bushel. If it cost him 50 cents per bushel to raise and market his crop, he had a prewar profit of $2,500. If this year he sells the same number of bushels at the minimum price of $2, his receipts would be $20,000. Let us suppose that his cost was twice as much as during the prewar period or $1 per bushel. His war profit would be $10,000. But he is given an exemption of $5,000, so that the war-profit tax would only apply to $5,000. What would his tax be, remembering that $2,500 was his average prewar profit?

On the first $375, at 12 per cent, the tax is $45.
On the next $250, at 16 per cent, the tax is $40.
On the next $625, at 20 per cent, the tax is $125.
On the next $625, at 25 per cent, the tax is $156.25.
On the next $625, at 30 per cent, the tax is $187.50.
War profit, $2,500; tax, $553.75, or 22 per cent.

But, Mr. President, if the statutory price for wheat stimulates production, as claimed by its advocates, we have a right to suppose that the same farmer will raise 15,000 bushels of wheat instead of 10,000 as before.

Assuming that his cost is $1 per bushel, he would have a profit of $15,000. Allowing the $5,000 exemption, he would have $10,000 to tax, less his prewar profit of $2,500.

The tax on this war profit of $7,500 would be $2,125, or 28 per cent.

The cotton planter who raised 200 bales of cotton and sold it at $50 a bale received $10,000. Supposing that it cost him $7,500, he had a prewar profit of $2,500. If he raises this year the same number of bales and sells at 20 cents a pound, his war-profit tax would be $553.75, or 22 per cent.

Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there are many, many business institutions, many corporations of every kind and character in this country, whose taxes under the Senate committee provision will not amount to anything like one-half the tax imposed upon these farmers in proportion to their net revenue.

Here is a very interesting proposition: If the wheat and cotton farmer had no prewar profit, then under the bill his exemption would depend on the profits made by representative farmers in the same line of business. If there was no profit by such representative farmers, then there would probably be no exemption.

Can it be said that because the profits of a trade or business have increased for the year 1917 that all of such increase is due to the war? If a part of the increased profit is due to the war and a part is not, who can say what proportion is due to the war? Is the balance sheet of every line of business influenced by the war? Does a business far inland and far removed from any of the war activities owe its increased profits to the existence of the war?

But, Mr. President, if we assume for the purpose of this discussion a fact which is not true—viz, that all profits which are above a certain standard are due to the war and as such taxable as war profits—then the inquiry naturally presents itself, What is the just standard for ascertaining what would be the normal profit but for the war?

Two basic methods have been suggested:

(1) The average profits made during the prewar period of 1911 to 1913, inclusive.

(2) A fixed percentage on the actual capital invested.

The bill adopts the first method, and I desire to point out a few of the numerous objections to that plan, without attempting to go into too much detail.

(1) The time is too remote.

It has now been six years since the beginning of that period. There have been numerous changes in every community in the business affairs; changes in physical conditions; changes in plant and machinery; changes in freight rates; changes in cost of material; changes in labor conditions; changes in taxes and assessments; changes in selling costs; changes in competition; and changes in every aspect to which business is subjected.

(2) CHANGES IN OWNERSHIP.

Many factories, sawmills, stores, mines, foundries, and other businesses belonging to individuals and to corporations have changed ownerships. Present owners on account of ascending prices have paid more for such properties and businesses than the profits for the prewar period would justify. It is obviously unfair and unjust to fix the present owner's deduction or exemption on the basis of the former owners profits at a preceding period and with different capital invested.

(3) NOT UNIFORM IN APPLICATION.

If the memory of Senators does not sustain the proposition that business conditions greatly differed in the same line of business in different sections of the country during the prewar period they can readily convince themselves that such is the fact by examining the income-tax returns or the statistics from the bankrupt courts. From the same sources Senators will find that different lines of business in the same section enjoyed prosperity in entirely different proportions.

During one of the three years some sections dependent upon the cotton crop suffered on account of the boll weevil; others suffered on account of floods or droughts, while others had a uniform period of prosperity.

The same situation applies to sections of the country dependent on wheat or corn or fruit.

Manufacturers and wholesalers who are dependent for their trade upon the involved sections are subjected to the same injustice when their variable success is measured for taxation purposes by the same yardstick that measures the exemption of the uniformly successful manufacturer or wholesaler in other sections. Our country is so large; the business affairs are so complex; the conditions so different; the methods employed are so varied; the density of population and the education and training of the people are so dissimilar that no arbitrary rule of profits will fit alike all over the country.

In some sections there is a highly developed system of business efficiency. This condition naturally follows with long settlement, large population, improved and scientific facilities, and cheap money. In other sections business methods are primeval—the people are poor, and uneducated, and pioneering.

The prewar period of exemptions if applied alike to both communities works a hardship on the business men of the undeveloped country.

If war profits are to be taxed as such, then a fairer basis for ascertaining such profits would be to allow as a normal profit a certain percentage upon the capital invested. That plan will treat everybody alike and will deal with present conditions. The basis is not new. It was adopted by the House in originating the pending bill.

It was agreed upon and approved by both House and Senate by the act taxing excess profits approved March 3, 1917.

That law is still in effect. Under the title of excess profits it levies a tax of 8 per cent upon the net income of every corporation and partnership in excess of (a) $5,000 and (b) 8 per cent of the capital invested.

Whether or not the Constitution so requires, simple justice does require that all taxation and exemption from taxation be equal and uniform, and the greater the exigency and consequent burden the more firmly we should hold to the rule. The existing law and the new war-revenue measure as passed by the House levying the tax on all profits in excess of 8 per cent on invested capital are equal and uniform in the exemption and in the levy. Stated broadly, the Senate Finance Committee's measure levies the tax on all profits of each business unit in excess of its average profits for the three-year period ending in 1913, regardless of the percentage of return on its invested capital; saving only concerns which did not exist during the prewar period, the tax is levied on all profits in excess of the profits of a representative concern in the same line of business which is to be selected by the Secretary of the Treasury. Or to put the measure in the light of its actual operation, the measure accords to each unit of business an exemption from this special taxation of the average amount of the annual profits derived by each business unit during the prewar period with provision for excepted cases. As just stated, the exemption as fixed by the existing law and by the House measure is uniform, being 8 per cent on the amount of the capital invested, whereas the exemption fixed by the pending measure reported by the Finance Committee of this body will vary and is designed to vary according to the experience of each unit during a three-year period ending three years or more ago, except in those cases where the necessary experience does not exist. In other words, the exemption provided by the Finance Committee's measure can have no claim to uniformity in any but the excepted cases, so that uniformity in the exemption will be the exception and is designed to be the exception instead of the rule.

The committee's measure, stated in another way, creates a permanent exemption from taxation of the average amount of profits derived during a three-year period ending more than three years ago, as though that short and rather remote experience established for all time an inflexible standard of profit and thereby contradicted, and indeed nullified, all other experience of all mankind through all the ages. I say in contradiction of all other experience, because I will hazard that under normal conditions scarcely a single active business unit of even the conservative and stable kind will reap the same profits in two or more equal successive periods of even greater length than three years; and we deal here with business of every kind from the most stable and conservative to the most unstable and speculative. What becomes of all other experience that every unit of business has its ever varying, good, bad, and indifferent periods, due to a train of innumerable causes themselves ever varying in both kind and degree, such as, for illustration, the purely personal equation of management, good will, labor conditions, supply and demand of both what is bought and sold, competition, credit losses, accidents, amount and cost of credit, peace or war, and even taxation. Certainly a material change in taxation must be accorded its proper effect on the business it burdens, and yet the committee, in the very measure it writes on the theory of inflexibility, imposed on business—and by way of change—the most burdensome taxation in the history of the Nation.

And there is equal, if not greater, error in the adjustment of the exemption based on the experience of the prewar period to subsequent changes in the amount of capital invested. The amount of capital invested during the prewar period and the profits derived therefrom being first ascertained and exempted, the measure provides that the exemption shall thereafter be increased or diminished in proportion to any subsequent increase or diminution of invested capital. The assumption here is that all of the many causes which affected and together produced the profit record of business during the prewar period found absolute stability for each unit in direct proportion to the amount of invested capital, and therefore that any change in the amount of invested capital must hereafter work a corresponding change in the profit record. But, if it were true that the profits of each business unit were directly proportionate to and wholly dependent upon the amount of its invested capital, then it would follow that the profits sheet of each line of business and of each unit of business would be in direct and equal proportion to its invested capital, and yet the measure provides that, for the purpose of determining the initial exemption, there shall be an examination of each business unit for the very purpose of discovering in each case separately what was the actual and differing proportion of profit to the amount of capital invested. Upon the whole, therefore, it is fair to say that the committee's assumptions are quite conflicting, for it first assumes that the amount of invested capital in each unit of business was during the prewar period but one of the many factors controlling its profit sheet, and then assumes that after the close of the prewar period the amount of its profits will automatically increase or diminish in direct proportion to the amount of any increase or diminution of invested capital regardless of all other causes.

May I venture that if it sometimes happens that a business well conceived, located, organized, and conducted, suffers, languishes, and even dies for want of adequate capital, it also happens that other businesses, such, for illustration, as banks, many times suffer because of the lack of demand for capital? And may I venture that the money market has its variations along with commodity markets, and that credit in many instances meets exigencies quite as effectively as invested capital? And may I venture further that there are many lines and units of business which require only nominal capital and some that require none at all; and need I venture that while capital is of the utmost importance in business, so are character, competency, and efficiency, supply and demand?

I can have but little confidence in a theory of legislation which will not stand some practical and matter-of-fact test in the actual affairs of life. We know that the very law of our being is change; that evolution is but another word for progressive change in obedience to the law of cause and effect, wherein every effect itself becomes in turn a cause; that evolution, as it has been said, is God's way of doing things; and that, as it has been said, the present is the child of the past and the parent of the future, and that every day bringeth forth its own fruit. How, then, can we write a law on the theory of inflexibility when the law itself works a change, and a violent change, and must itself remain subject to change, and in that law enact that the profits of each unit of business shall be separately ascertained and exempted in recognition of the fact that such profits differ widely in proportion to capital, and then provide for periodical changes in the exemption in direct proportion to any change in capital regardless of all other conditions or controlling causes?

Having considered the method, now let us consider the practical result of the committee's scheme. It is manifestly to give each unit of business permanent exemption from this special tax throughout the life of the law in an amount equal to its profits during the prewar period, regardless of the conditions which produced those profits and regardless of the proportion they bore to the capital invested, and then to adjust from year to year the amount of the exemption in proportion to any subsequent increase or diminution in the amount of capital invested. In other words, the greater profit during the prewar period, the greater the exemption, regardless of the capital, and then the greater the capital the proportionately greater exemption. Verily to them that have shall be given and to them who have not shall be taken away even that which they have. If, for illustration, a newly established iron foundry, having a capital of $100,000, reaped an average annual profit of $6,000 during the prewar period, it will be entitled to an initial exemption of $6,000; and if the capital of the business has been increased since the expiration of the prewar period in the amount of $100,000 an additional exemption of $6,000 will be accorded on account of such increase, making a total exemption of $12,000 on a total capital of $200,000, and being at the rate of 6 per cent.

Then take another iron foundry in the same locality in active competition with the first, which, having a capital of $100,000, made during the prewar period an annual profit of $25,000. This business will be entitled to an initial exemption of $25,000, and if it shall have increased its capital $100,000 it will, on account of the increase, enjoy an additional exemption of $25,000, or a total of $50,000, on a capital of $200,000, being at the rate both as to the original capital and as to new capital of 25 per cent. The effect, therefore, of the measure is to guarantee in each case an exemption from this special taxation equal to the amount of profits realized during the prewar period and to limit the amount of exemption to the experience of that period, and also to guarantee a change of exemption proportionate to any change in capital, and likewise to limit the same. It would seem enough of good fortune that a business has earned more than a normal profit and is permitted to keep and multiply the whole of it without the Government granting the business a subsidy on account of its good fortune, increasing in amount with its good fortune, and at the expense of those of lesser fortune. And it would seem enough of lesser fortune without on that account being overtaxed in comparison with those of better fortune. But we did not or should not deal with individual fortune, good or bad, but with the taxation of abnormal profits during the period that the Government is put to abnormal expenditures, and the scheme should be equal and uniform in its burdens. Exemptions from taxation are in effect governmental subsidies, and they are obnoxious at best and should, in any event, be the exception rather than the rule. Whenever they are granted, the purpose is to maintain a business that is not self-sustaining and which renders a peculiarly beneficial public service, and the subsidies are and should be limited to the necessities of the case. Under the committee's scheme the subsidy granted will not be in proportion to any degree of necessity, but rather in proportion to any lack of necessity, for the subsidy increases in proportion, first, as the profits are greater, and then as the capital is increased. Taxation can never be absolutely fair, but the just effort must always be, where inequalities are necessary, to place the least burden on those of least liability to bear the burden, and when there are graduations in any scheme of taxation the graduation has heretofore been in proportion to benefit rather than in proportion to lack of benefit. Upon the whole, I submit that the scheme is chimerical in supposing that the profits of business units during the three-year period ending more than three years ago furnish an inflexible standard for the measurement of future normal profits of each business; that the scheme is unjust in permitting unequal exemptions on additional capital merely because of the greater earning capacity of a particular business during the prewar period; that the scheme is also unjust in its operation in granting a greater exemption in one case than in another merely because of the greater previous profit in the one case in comparison with the other; and that the scheme violates in its essential basis the fundamental principles of equality and uniformity, which are the dictates of simple justice.

The public understands the terms of the law now on the statute book. It is simple and easy to administer. If it will not raise enough money, why not increase the rate rather than experiment with an imported and untried, complicated plan?

It seems to me that in increasing the rate a graduated schedule should be adopted so as to lighten the burden on the small business unit. I suggest the following schedule:

Ten per cent on the first $25,000, and let the tax be increased 1 per cent for each additional $25,000 until $300,000 should be reached at a tax of 21 per cent.

Then let the additional increases be in amounts of $100,000 until a tax of 28 per cent at $1,000,000 should be reached, and then let the subsequent increases be at the rate of $250,000 until a rate of 33 per cent should be reached at $2,000,000, and then let the subsequent increases be at the rate of 2 per cent for each additional million until a tax of 50 per cent is imposed.

We are all agreed, I assume, that business must be stimulated and encouraged, but I submit that abnormal prosperity should be stimulant and encouragement enough for the oversuccessful, and in any event that those of lesser success should not be burdened in the race by disproportionate and unequal taxation merely because their degree of success has been less than that of others.

Thursday August 16, 1917.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, when I yielded the floor yesterday I had laid the predicate for the conclusion and deduction that I now desire to submit to the Senate.

It will be remembered, Mr. President, that in the concluding remarks that I made on yesterday I submitted a plan, which I hope the Senate will adopt, for raising the necessary revenue that we now seek to find. This plan, in my judgment, would raise more money than the Finance Committee's plan, and would put the burden where it justly belongs, upon those who are best able to bear it without crippling business. I will say in this connection that I had a table prepared by one of the greatest experts in the country, and one who has had large experience in governmental affairs as they relate to revenue. That table I will print in connection with my remarks.

It will be seen that the taxes paid by a few large business units under the graduated schedule will overcome the losses on thousands of small business units. When a business makes several millions in excess of its normal profits it is largely immaterial what its taxes amount to. The concern is too strong to be hurt and its business efficiency is not impaired by a million more or less. But a small business unit is not so fortunate. A few hundred dollars out of a concern making several thousand dollars is felt, and if the hundreds are rapidly increased there may be weakened efficiency.

What percentage should be allowed on the capital invested as an exemption or reduction in ascertaining the excess profits? The pending bill as first reported by the Finance Committee fixed 6 per cent. As now reported it does not fix any percentage but leaves the deduction to be settled by the Treasury Department, where there was no net income or where the business is new, on the basis of the profits earned by representative businesses of the same character. In the first place, the taxpayers should not have their property rights dependent upon the discretion of any department of the Government. The suggested arrangement would be a big stick for clubbing business men into political line with the administration in power. It is wrong in principle. It is inexpedient; it would be uncertain in its operation.

In the next place, the taxpayer could not know from his own business what his exemption would be; he would not know how to calculate his taxes until the department made its investigation.

An examination of the Morgan list of corporations, submitted by the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee and printed in circulars, will show the very great discretion in the Treasury Department in selecting representative businesses in the same line. Take, for illustration, a steel company that had not been organized or had no net income during the prewar period. Under section 204 the amount of the war profits shall be the same proportion of the net income of the business received during the taxable year as the proportion which the war profits for the same calendar year of representative corporations engaged in a like business, whose profits are determined by the prewar basis, bears to the total net income of the business received by such corporations.

United States Steel Corporation, prewar average profit, $63,585,777; 1916 profit, $271,531,730. The ratio is about 4 to 1.

Bethlehem Steel, prewar average profit, $4,229,713; 1916 profit, $57,944,754. The ratio is about 14 to 1.

Lackawanna Steel, prewar profit, $1,371,556; 1916 profit, $12,218,235. The ratio is about 9 to 1.

Which would the Treasury Department select as a representative business?

Under the pending bill the important feature in ascertaining the amount of taxes is the deduction or exemption. All the percentages are based not upon the profits but upon the deduction. It would be as impossible to estimate the amount of taxes to be paid under the committee plan without knowing the deduction as it would be to calculate interest without knowing the principal.

The House proposed in the pending bill, as the House, the Senate, and the President agreed last March, that 8 per cent upon the actual capital invested is a fair and proper basis for fixing normal profits.

There are many good reasons why 8 per cent should be allowed upon capital rather than a lower percentage.

In many sections of the country it is necessary to pay 8 per cent on all money borrowed. Less than 8 per cent does not afford any margin for various unforeseen contingencies, which arise from time to time in most if not all business lines.

The purchasing power of a dollar is about one-half what it was before the war began. The proceeds from 8 per cent will buy about as much as 4 per cent on the same capital would buy before the war. Six per cent on invested capital now represents about 3 per cent on the same capital when normal profits were being earned during the prewar period.

It will be shortsighted and foolish to cramp business at this time. We are clamoring for more production; we are begging for increased efficiency; we are proclaiming that there must be greater output. How are the factories to be enlarged, how are the mills to be made more efficient, how are new mines to be opened, how are additional furnaces to be secured, how are the farmers to be supplied, if we legislate so as to impair credit and cramp and embarrass the small business units of this country?

Many small businesses have sprung up and are helping to furnish the things that are needed. Many of these have small capital and limited credit. If you take all their profits you may help the Treasury one year, but the production will be cut off, and probably the next year the taxpayer will be out of business.

You must not kill the goose before she lays the golden egg.

The argument in the report of the committee that the "fundamental difficulty in assessing a tax on these lines (taking a percentage upon the amount of actual capital invested as a normal profit) arises from the difficulty of establishing a standard or measure of the amount of actual capital invested" is completely answered by the last paragraph in section 204 of the bill as reported.

It is there provided that if the net income for the taxable year of a business which was not in existence during the whole of any one calendar year during the prewar period is less than 6 per cent per annum on the average capital actually employed in such business there shall be deemed to be no war profits.

By this provision the committee recognized the necessity in thousands of cases of basing the normal profits upon a percentage on actual capital invested. In the bill as originally reported by the committee all taxpayers whose prewar profits were subnormal had the privilege of fixing their normal profits by taking 6 per cent on the actual capital invested.

While it seems clear to me that the fairest and best way to raise the needed taxes is to levy a progressive tax on profits or income now earned, using the words "profits" and "income" as synonymous. Still, if the idea of taxing war profits or excess profits must be adhered to, I insist that the only way to make such a tax apply with equality to all sections, under all conditions, and at all times is to fix a certain rate of normal profits on actual capital invested, and then to apply the tax rate to the excess.

The greatest injustice in this bill is the basis for applying the progressive schedule to the excess or war profits.

The report of the committee states that it is wrong to impose the same rate of taxation upon one who is making but a small additional profit as upon one who is making a large additional profit. The trouble is that the committee has failed to take into consideration the proposition that those who are making large additional profits now should be required to pay in proportion to what they are making now, and should not have their payments reduced because of their prosperity during the prewar period.

The bill does not levy a tax upon the basis of the amount of additional profits, large or small. The bill does not take into account the ability of the taxpayer to pay the tax. The amount of tax as proposed by the bill is not based upon the amount of profits earned now, but upon the deduction or profits earned during the prewar period.

Section 201 provides that a tax shall be paid upon income equal to the following percentages of the war profits (determined as provided in the bill):

Twelve per cent of the amount of such war profits not in excess of 15 per cent of the deduction allowed by sections 203, 204, and 205. The "deduction allowed" by sections 204 and 205 being the difference between the net income and the war profits as there determined, while the deduction allowed by section 203 is the average profit during the prewar period.

It takes a professor of mathematics to figure out the tax under this plan, and only the professors in the great universities, combined with Treasury Department experts, can calculate the "deduction allowed" by sections 204 and 205.

The deduction allowed by section 203 is the prewar profit, while the deduction allowed by sections 204 and 205 is proportionate to the war profits and depends upon the discretion exercised by the Treasury Department in selecting representative businesses to be used as a guide.

The schedule then runs as follows:

Sixteen per cent of the amount by which the war profits exceeds 15 per cent of the deduction and do not exceed 25 per cent.

On the next 25 per cent of the deduction, 20 per cent.

On the next 25 per cent of the deduction, 25 per cent.

On the next 25 per cent of the deduction, 30 per cent.

On the next 50 per cent of the deduction, 35 per cent.

On the next 50 per cent of the deduction, 40 per cent.

On the next 50 per cent of the deduction, 45 per cent.

On all over 250 per cent of the deduction, 50 per cent.

I ask leave to have Tables A to G, inclusive, and the recapitulation, published at this point in my remarks without reading them at length. I will state here, Mr. President, that these tables are intended to be a key by which Senators can, without any difficulty whatever, compute these deductions and ascertain exactly what is the correct amount upon any given sum. I will ask to have these tables printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN in the chair). Without objection, the request of the Senator will be granted.

Mr. BANKHEAD. These tables demonstrate better than I can explain the workings of the proposed system.

A mere glance at the recapitulation will disclose the injustice of the plan.

I would remark here that the recapitulation referred to is the last table that I presented with the others to be printed in the RECORD.

I hope the Senators will pay particular attention to these figures. They have been worked out to a mathematical certainty, if the best experts in this country can perform a service like that under the provisions of this bill.

If the normal profit of a business was $1,000 and the present profit is $6,000, the tax is $2,071, or 34½ per cent of the current profit.

If the normal or prewar profit was $10,000 and the present profit is $20,000, the tax is $2,215, or 11¾ per cent of the current profit.

If the prewar profit was $10,000 and the present profit is $110,000, the tax is $45,715, or 41½ per cent.

I ask the Senators what they think of a bill that permits such gross inequalities as these that I have enumerated?

If the prewar profit was $100,000 and the present profit is $200,000, the tax is $22,150, or 11¾ per cent.

In one case the business has earned $100,000 profit for each of the three prewar years and has earned $200,000 this year, making thereby an excess profit of $100,000. During the four years the business has added $500,000 in profits to its assets or its owners. Its war tax is $22,150. The business which earned $10,000 during each of the three prewar years and has made $110,000 this year has added $140,000 to its assets or its owners and is required to pay $45,715 in taxes.

Such inequality is absolutely indefensible. No amount of sophistry can square such a plan with the rule of fairness and equality.

If a business during the prewar period earned each year $100,000 and this year earned $100,000 excess profits, its tax would be $22,150. During the four years its earnings would be $500,000.

If another competing business across the street earned $1,000,000 for each of the prewar years and earned this year an excess profit of $100,000, its tax would be $12,000. During the four years its earnings would be $4,100,000. The war profits of each concern were exactly the same, viz, $100,000. The tax on the little business is $10,150 more than it is on the big business, although the big business has earned for the tax year $1,000,000 more than the little business and during the four years involved has earned $3,600,000 more than the little business.

Mr. President, I do not care whether you call it a war profit or any other sort of a profit. My proposition is to add largely to the taxation on their profits, as will be shown in the table that I will print with my remarks.

The little business pays 11¾ per cent of its net earnings for the current year while the big business pays 11/11 per cent of its net earnings and each had exactly the same number of excess or war-profit dollars.

Take a business with an average prewar profit of $100,000 and let it earn an excess profit of $500,000. Its tax would be $207,150. Then take a business with an average prewar profit of $1,000,000 and let it earn an excess profit of exactly the amount as that earned by the $500,000-profit producer. Its tax would be $84,000. Little business pays 34½ per cent of its current net income while big business pays 5⅜ per cent.

The practical operation of the plan is to make the burden light on the taxpayer who has been making large profits and to make it heavy on the taxpayer who has been making small profits.

An examination of the tables submitted shows that small business, comprising hundreds of thousands of individuals and corporations is made to carry the load that ought to fall on the shoulders of big business. The plan of the committee protects the few as against the many; it shields the strong and loads down the weak; it puts a penalty on adversity during the prewar period; it gives a premium on account of success during that period.

For further illustration of the proposition that little business is punished for the benefit of the big business, let us take one more example from the tables.

A man earned an average of $5,000 during the prewar period. This year he earns an excess profit of $20,000. Such cases are plentiful. His tax would be $7,857.50.

A corporation earned an average of $1,000,000 during the prewar period, and this year it earns an excess profit of $20,000, making earnings for the year of $1,020,000. What do you suppose its taxes would be?

The earnings of the big business was more than 40 times as much as the little business.

As the principle of taxation is that all should pay in accordance with their ability to pay, one would naturally say that the big business should pay 40 times as much as the little business. But no; big business and little business are not measured by the same rule.

But surely big business would be required to pay as much as little business on exactly the same amount of excess profits, especially as big business has so much more net income from which to pay it than little business.

Under this English plan, so called—which is not the English plan by any means, because the very best element of that plan has been eliminated and is not applicable here—under the imported plan reported by the committee the tax on the $25,000 earnings of "little business," $20,000 of which is war profit, is $7,857.50, while the tax on the $1,020,000 earnings of "big business," $20,000 of which (the exact war profit of "little business") is war profits, is the princely sum of $2,400.

The constitutions of nearly all the States provide, in substance, that all property shall share the burden of taxation in proportion to its value.

This fundamental principle of taxation is recognized by all as just and fair. It is, however, repudiated and destroyed by the war-profit plan under consideration.

No one can dispute the proposition that a tax on what one now has rather than on what he had at some former time is a just rule of taxation. The pending bill grossly outrages this principle.

The tax should be based upon the amount of profit now rather than upon a percentage of the deduction or prewar profit. Instead of the tax progressing step by step with the increase of the percentage of the excess profits over the normal profits it should increase step by step with the increase of the amount of the excess profits.

It is wrong and oppressive to levy a tax on small business which amounts to between 25 and 50 per cent of the profits. For a number of years in some sections of the country business in many lines has been greatly depressed. I have statements of a number of coal companies in Alabama. Their statements of income is taken from their income-tax reports. I am going to give a few of them without stating names. I shall be glad to furnish the names privately to any Senator who desires the information:

These statements show several things of interest and importance in fixing tax rates.

They show the widest range of success by competing companies and by the same company.

For instance, one company shows a loss of $1,481.26 for 1911, a profit of $31,257.91 for 1913, and a loss of $100,653.66 for 1916.

How can any fair standard of exemptions for a prewar period be based upon such varying business?

Another company shows the loss during the prewar period of practically its entire capital invested, of more than half a million dollars.

D shows a profit of $74,857.96 for 1911 and a loss of $1,175.96 for 1913, while G, a competing company, shows a loss of $1,481.36 for 1911 and a profit of $31,257.91 for 1913.

Thus it appears that one company made a profit while the other had a loss in 1911, and these two companies reversed positions in 1913. Still the bill provides that the rate of taxation shall be fixed upon an equal basis to be determined by the Treasury Department.

How can a fair system of present taxation be established on the amount of the prewar profits so as to cause both companies to share the burden of the war alike? A graduated rate based upon a percentage of the prewar profits as proposed in the bill can not work with equal fairness under such differing degrees of adversity during the prewar period.

Another lesson to be drawn from the foregoing figures is the financial inability of many necessary businesses to weather a staggering rate of taxation.

The figures show that the physical condition of the coal properties has necessarily been going down. Money for new pipe, rails, ties and timbers, tipple and house repairs, and new openings has not been available from the income during the years preceding the war. The years 1914, 1915, and 1916 were just as bad in Alabama as the years 1911, 1912, and 1913, and it is my information that the same conditions prevailed in the coal fields of Tennessee, Kentucky, and Illinois. I am not advised about other sections. There was no profit to the Alabama coal operators until March of this year. Since that time the profits have gone back into the property in an effort to repair and renew with the view of increasing the output.

No article, with the exception possibly of wheat, is more important in the prosecution of the war than coal. The output is not equal to the requirements. It is important that every proper encouragement be rendered to the end of securing a greatly increased coal production. A large production is important, not alone for war purposes, direct and indirect, but to provide a sufficient supply to the general consumers, so that they may secure the same at normal prices.

Mr. President, we have heard a great deal of the exorbitant prices at which coal is selling. In a sense that is true, but it is also true that these excessive prices occur only as to what is known as free coal; that is, coal of operators who have not had their output under contract. These operators, producing not over 10 per cent of the output of coal, owing to the great demand for coal, have been able to exact and to obtain exorbitant prices; it is the exception and not the rule.

If a tax which ranges from 22 to 45 per cent is levied on the present profits, how can the price of mine labor be increased; how can old mines be reopened; how can present mines be enlarged; how can new mines be opened, in view of the fact that there have been so many lean years prior to the war?

Mr. President, I have no objection to the most drastic remedy that can be applied to make people keep and perform their contracts.

If the proposed rate of taxation is adopted, many business units in Alabama, because of the fact that they have put all earnings back into the business, will have to borrow the money to pay the tax or let the Government take their property for its satisfaction.

Mr. President, the cotton mills of Alabama, the sawmills, the foundries, and all the other industrial and manufacturing concerns are in the same condition.

They are all willing to pay their just share of the war taxes. They are willing to pay a fixed percentage on their net incomes just as individuals pay on incomes, or they are willing to pay a fixed percentage on the amount of their present profits, but I protest against requiring them to pay under a plan which has for its basis the inquiry, Were you prosperous during the prewar period? If so, your rate of taxation will increase slowly. Or, Did you suffer financial distress during the prewar period? If so, your rate of taxation will increase rapidly. You say to them, too, You did not use your talents successfully; therefore your exemptions will be small. You are not entitled to the same consideration as the one who made large profits. As you did not keep up with your competitor, then we will not let you overtake him now. We will make the distance further between you. In addition to the gain he made then we will allow him to retain a greater percentage of his profits now than we will permit you to retain. We will help his business grow bigger; we will hold yours in the little-business class.

The distinguished chairman of the committee had much to say in his opening speech about squeezing the taxes out of big business, and made frequent reference to the United States Steel Corporation.

A comparison of the figures in the Morgan list, as presented by the chairman, discloses that his argument is unsound. As shown by that list, the earnings of the United States Steel Corporation for 1916 were $271,945,953, while its tax under the committee plan amounts to $76,726,471. It will, therefore, pay 28 per cent of its net income as war taxes. The net incomes of its two smaller competitors for 1916 were as follows:

Bethlehem Steel, $57,944,754. Its tax amounts to $25,045,090, or 43 per cent of its net income—

While the Steel Corporation pays 28 per cent of its net income—

Lackawana Steel, $12,218,235. Its tax amounts to $4,835,627, or approximately 40 per cent of its net income.

Does that look like squeezing the water or the taxes out of them in proportion to their size? It seems to me that these figures presented by the distinguished chairman show that the rule is to tax in proportion to the inability to pay.

The Morgan list, upon which the chairman relies to prove his case as against the House basis, shows the capital of each corporation, but does not state whether it means "capital stock" or "capital actually invested." We all recognize that there is a wonderful difference between watered stock and stock which represents capital invested. We also know that a large part of the outstanding corporate stock is watered stock. In applying the rule of an exemption, based upon actual capital invested, it is highly important to differentiate "stock issued" from stock actually paid for.

After the Morgan list was promulgated by the chairman, failing, by inquiry, to ascertain what "capital" as there used was intended to cover, I sent to the Library for the "Manual of Statistics—Stock Exchange Handbook for 1917," and by comparing that book with the Morgan list I found that in practically every case the amount of "capital" stated in the Morgan list was much in excess of capital stock issued and surplus stated in the manual. I will say the manual of which I speak is the official handbook used on the stock exchange in New York and contains the figures which everyone consults for correct information with reference to stock issues and profits. This is the list presented by the chairman of the committee. I present the comparative statements, bearing in mind that the larger the "capital" the larger the exemption under the House plan, and I ask leave to have them printed in the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request will be granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Morgan Manual of Statistics.]

	Capital.	Stock issued.	Surplus.	Bonded indebtedness.

Standard Oil of New York	143,600,000	75,000,000	26,463,254

Mr. BANKHEAD. In this connection it may be well to point out the difference in the prewar profits of the United States Steel as contained in the Morgan list and the manual. The Morgan list gives the average for the three years at $63,585,777. The manual gives the net earnings by month and by quarter, and according to its figures the average net income or prewar profit at $116,553,827. The Morgan list gives the net income for 1916 at $271,531,730. The manual gives it at $333,574,177. Notwithstanding there was $62,042,447 more profit by the figures of the manual than by the Morgan figures, the tax under the manual figures would be $63,031,434.55 and under the Morgan figures the tax would be $76,726,000. While this looks queer and unreasonable, it can be understood when we recall that as the profits increase the tax decreases. The tabulation presented by the chairman, as compared with the figures given in the Manual of Statistics, is too favorable to the Senate plan on prewar profits and is exaggerated as against the House plan on the amount of capital actually employed.

A study of the Morgan list reveals a number of remarkable inequalities. Compare the General Electric and Lackawanna Steel. The profits of the latter company in 1916 were $12,218,235. Its tax under Senate bill is $4,835,627, or 40 per cent of its net income. The profits of the General Electric were $18,589,528, $6,000,000 more than Lackawanna. Its tax under the Senate bill is $1,136,038, or 6½ per cent of its net income. While the net profits of Electric was $6,000,000 more than Lackawanna, its taxes would be $3,699,589 less.

Compare Eastman Kodak with New York Air Brake. Eastman had $17,289,206 net income in 1916. Its tax under the Senate bill is $591,467, or 3½ per cent of its profit. Air Brake had $9,414,962 net income in 1916. Its tax under the Senate bill is $4,312,964, or 36 per cent of its profits. Eastman made nearly twice as much profit and pays about one-eighth as much tax.

Mr. President, I stop long enough to inquire how it can be possible that the Senate of the United States will stamp its approval upon such inequalities as I have shown to exist by the figures?

Compare Scoville Manufacturing Co. with American Sugar Refining Co. Scoville earned $13,403,462 and will pay $6,202,254 taxes, or 47 per cent of its profits. The sugar refinery earned $13,703,444 and will pay $690,410 taxes, or 5 per cent of its profits.

These two companies had the same profit, while one pays $5,539,844 more taxes than the other.

The Central Leather Co. had $15,489,201 profit and will pay $4,520,102 taxes, while the Delaware & Lackawanna Railroad earned $16,200,148 and will pay only $1,122,837 in taxes.

The American Can Co. earned $9,462,982 and will pay $766,381 in taxes, or 8 per cent. The United States Industrial Alcohol Co. earned $4,884,586. It will pay $1,644,757 in taxes, or 33 per cent. While the can company earned twice as much as the alcohol company, it will pay only half as much taxes.

As a final illustration, from the Morgan list, of the wonderful equality of the committee's plan I point out that the Scoville Manufacturing Co., with a capital of $21,000,000, will be called on to pay $6,202,254 in taxes, that being 47 per cent of its net income, 30 per cent on its capital, and 48 per cent of its excess profits, while the great and wealthy Pennsylvania Railroad, with a capital of $930,400,000, is called on to pay 3 per cent of its net income, eighteen one-hundredths per cent on its capital, and 14½ per cent of its excess profits.

What about the great automobile factories? I have no available figures, but the absence of such rich corporations as the Ford Motor Co. from the Morgan list of big companies suggests that there may be some reason. The automobile companies had large profits during the prewar period. I hope the Senate will follow these figures, because sooner or later you will be called squarely to meet this question; you will be called to meet it on the floor of the Senate, and you will be called to meet it at the bar of public justice. I hope, therefore, you will follow the figures as I offer them. That gives them a large exemption. During the last three years they have made tremendous profits. Those profits have, in large part, gone in to enlarge plants. They have been converted into additional capital, and every dollar of profit put back into increased capacity has not only provided for still larger profits because of enlarged business, but has increased proportionately the exemption allowed from taxation.

For instance, if the Ford Motor Co. during the prewar period had capital of $5,000,000 and were entitled to an exemption of $1,000,000 as prewar profits, every $5,000,000 added to the capital since 1913 would double the $1,000,000 exemption. If the Ford Co. has since 1913 put $25,000,000 of its profits back into capital account—and it has doubtless put more—its exemption would be, on the basis suggested, $5,000,000.

As most of the automobile companies have made large profits since 1913 and have added a large part of their profits to capital account, their increased exemptions would be so large that it is probable that their war tax would be negligible under the committee plan.

Here is a remarkable development, to my mind: An examination of three of the leading tobacco companies discloses interesting results. The figures are taken from the Manual of Statistics, as none of the companies appear in the Morgan list. The American Tobacco Co. had a net profit of $12,412,624 in 1916, but its average prewar profit was larger than that amount. Therefore it would pay no tax under the Senate bill. Of course, it will pay its income tax. Everybody pays that. I pay that. I am not discussing that phase of the question at all. I am assuming that every Senator and every other taxpayer in the country understands that he must pay his due part of the income tax for the support of the Government. What I am contending is that this excess-profits scheme exempts from taxation for any purpose large amounts. Therefore it would pay no taxes. Its capital stock is $92,942,403 and its surplus is $37,081,533, making a total of $130,023,933. On the basis of allowing 8 per cent on its capital there would be over $2,000,000 subject to taxation.

Mr. President, I am complaining and I am insisting that this war-tax business is a misnomer. It has no place in any legislative program that we can make. I am insisting that every man who makes a profit in this country should pay his proportionate part of excess profits in addition to his income tax, and it makes no difference whether he is a hill-billy making a few hundred or a few thousand dollars or whether he is a great manufacturer. It makes no difference in principle.

Liggett & Myers had no more profit in 1916 than they had during the prewar period. Their profit for 1916 was $8,416,813, but under the Senate plan they would pay no tax. Their stock and surplus is nearly $50,000,000, while they have a bonded indebtedness of nearly $30,000,000. If no account is taken of their indebtedness they would, under the House plan, pay taxes on about $4,500,000.

Mr. President, what I am insisting on is that this is our war, and we must find revenue somewhere, by some means, to finance ourselves and our allies; and I can not consent to the proposition that these vast incomes shall be exempt. It makes no difference to me, Mr. President, what their prewar profits were. They are citizens of this country. These vast amounts of capital of theirs look to the Government for protection just as the small producer or manufacturer looks to the Government for protection, and I insist that each one should pay his fair part.

R. J. Reynolds had a prewar profit of $2,862,566. Their profit for 1916 was $8,043,677. Under the Senate plan their tax would be approximately $2,750,000.

Here are competitors in the same line of business. Two of them pay nothing from their tremendous profits, while the third pay about one-third of their profits. I want some Senator to explain how the great American Tobacco Co. escapes its part of the war burden—for this is a war burden—while Reynolds is required to contribute one-third of his net income.

Mr. President, I am not impressed with the idea that we must get our revenues only from war profits. It might be said that all profits, practically, have been more or less influenced by the war, and how are you going to tell which is war profit and which is not war profit? I can not understand.

I favor a graduated tax on such profits as are made taxable, provided the graduation in rate is based on the amount of taxable profits in the case of each business concern, just as the income tax is graduated in its rate on the amount of income subject to taxation. But I am opposed to any plan of taxation under which the rate is graduated on the proportion which taxable profits bear to nontaxable profits, and such is the plan of the committee.

It seems to me that the showing made by the tables submitted of the inequalities in the amount of taxes levied on equal amounts of taxable profits is in itself enough to at once conclusively condemn any plan of taxation which brings about such results, without stopping to examine any possible theory which may be advanced to support it.

I say this because the plan results in the grossest violation of every law of economy, morality, and of justice, and disregards every consideration of expediency and the wisdom of experience—and the best test of a law is found in the result of its application. The conception of the committee must be that because a new source of revenue has been found, and a new method conceived for determining what portion of such source of revenue is taxable, that a new principle of taxing the taxable portion must also be found and applied. To the contrary, I hold that established principles of primary justice are not only vital but virile and comprehend new and varying conditions, as well as old and stable conditions.

Without more of general observation, let us see what must be the theory advanced in support of a plan, which is obviously so monstrous in its working out. And it should be observed that the plan does not merely in a few extreme cases work inequalities in the different rates of taxation levied on exactly equal amounts of taxable profits but that it is the primary purpose of the plan that it shall so work in all cases where there is a difference in prewar profits, since the tax, strange to say, is graduated not on the amount of taxable profits but on the proportion of taxable profits to nontaxable profits.

Let me stress here that I use the term "prewar profits" according to its definition under the committee's plan, and that prewar profits under the committee's plan do not mean merely the actual average annual net profits realized during the prewar period but that such profits are by the committee's plan automatically increased or diminished in proportion to any subsequent change in capital. It follows, of course, that the prewar profits of those concerns which have prospered since the expiration of the prewar period—that is to say, during the momentous years of 1914, 1915, and 1916—will under the committee's plan be automatically increased by the additions to their capital resulting from such prosperity, just as though they had actually been earned during the prewar period, whereas the prewar profits of those concerns which have suffered during the same period will be automatically decreased by the resulting impairment of their capital.

The committee's scheme therefore, in short, is that the greater the prewar profits, and the greater, too, the increase in capital resulting from prosperity since the prewar period, the less not only the amount of taxable profits because of the greater exemption but also the lesser the rate of taxation will be on the diminished amount of taxable profits, and the lesser the prewar profits and the greater the decrease in capital resulting from adversity since the prewar period the greater not only the amount of taxable profits on account of the decreased exemption but also the greater the rate of taxation will be on the increased amount of taxable profits. And this is so, I repeat, because the prewar profits and the increase therein by additions to capital from prosperity subsequent to the prewar period are exempted from all taxation, and also because, notwithstanding such prewar profits are exempted altogether, nevertheless the tax is graduated not on the amount of profits which are found to be taxable after deducting the total amount of prewar profits as increased by additions to capital from subsequent prosperity but on the proportion that the taxable profits bear to such prewar profits as increased by additions to capital from subsequent prosperity, and because the prewar profits of those which have suffered during the period elapsing since the prewar period are diminished in proportion to any impairment of their capital resulting from their suffering during such period.

I repeat again that the committee's plan exempts from all taxation an amount equal to the whole of the prewar profits of each business concern and then increases such prewar profits in proportion to any additions to its capital, and taxes only the remaining profits as war profits upon the declared assumption that all remaining profits hereafter reaped during the period of our participation in the war will be due to the war and the war alone, and therefore that the whole of such remaining profits are in truth, as they are called, war profits and justly taxable as such. The fattest of the war brides must blush at the generosity of an exemption which is calculated first on the basis of profits during the prewar period and then multiplied in proportion to subsequent prosperity, and in any event will be too modest to claim that any profits remaining after such a generous exemption are not justly taxable as war profits. And yet the committee, by graduating the rate in the proportion that taxable profits bear to exempt profits, in effect multiplies the exemption as often as it changes the rate of taxation. The very and only purpose in deducting the whole of the amount of prewar profits as increased by subsequent additions to capital from the total profits is to ascertain what amount of total profits are in fact war profits. Then why not tax those war profits in proportion to their amount, just as the income tax is levied on the amount of income? When the whole of a most generous exemption has been made fully effective by deducting it from the total profits, what further proper function can the amount of the exemption have in the plan? None, absolutely none, I submit. When war profits have once been ascertained for the purpose of taxation I am unable to see why, in any case from a given amount, more should be taken from one than another. But if there be any such case it certainly is not the case of those who have been treated with the greatest generosity in determining the amount of their taxable profits. And yet those who have received the most generous treatment in that regard are the ones who are to be many times further favored in the rate. I confess that the plan is, to my mind, so monstrous that I am astounded that it should be brought before this body for serious consideration.

Let us go back now to the illustrative cases of the two foundries, one old and well established and the other new, each having $100,000 capital during the prewar period, but the old foundry earning 25 per cent on its capital and the new foundry only 10 per cent on its capital, and each having subsequently added an additional $100,000 to its capital. In the case of the old and well-established foundry it will be entitled to an exemption of $50,000 per annum out of its total profits, because it established an annual earning capacity of $25,000 during the prewar period and then doubled its capital, whereas the new foundry will be entitled to an exemption of only $20,000 out of its total profits because it established an annual earning capacity of only $10,000 during the prewar period and subsequently doubled its capital. And let us remember that each foundry had during the prewar period exactly the same amount of capital and that each subsequently added the same amount of new capital. Now let us assume that each of the foundries will earn this year $100,000.

It will be found that only $50,000 of the profits of the old foundry are taxable, since it is entitled to an exemption of $50,000 out of its earnings of $100,000, and that $80,000 of the profits of the new foundry are taxable, since it is entitled to an exemption of only $20,000 out of its earnings of $100,000. This discrimination in exemption would seem enough of tribute to the greater prewar prosperity, but this tribute, it will be found, is quite insignificant in comparison with the rates of taxation which must be applied under the committee's plan, so much greater is the rate in the case of the new foundry than in the case of the old foundry. I now submit the actual figures in detail compiled in accordance with the committee's schedule of rates.

I have now come to the schedule of rates, and I ask permission to have them printed without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Old foundry, $50,000 deduction, $50,000 taxable.

Tax on first 15 per cent at 12 per cent	$900
Tax on next 10 per cent at 16 per cent	800
Tax on next 25 per cent at 20 per cent	2,500
Tax on next 25 per cent at 25 per cent	3,125
Tax on next 25 per cent at 30 per cent	3,750
$50,000 taxable, tax	11,075

New foundry, $20,000 deduction, $80,000 taxable.

Tax on first 15 per cent at 12 per cent	$360
Tax on next 10 per cent at 16 per cent	320
Tax on next 25 per cent at 20 per cent	1,000
Tax on next 25 per cent at 25 per cent	1,250
Tax on next 25 per cent at 30 per cent	1,500
100 per cent.
Tax on next 50 per cent at 35 per cent	3,500
Tax on next 50 per cent at 40 per cent	4,000
Tax on next 50 per cent at 45 per cent	4,500
$50,000, tax	16,430

Mr. BANKHEAD. Thus it will be seen that in taxing equal amounts ($50,000) of the taxable profits in the two cases there is a difference of $5,355 in the taxes, due to the difference in the rate because of difference in the exemption. Let me point out that the new foundry still has $30,000 of taxable profits, which is to be taxed at the rate of 50 per cent, making $15,000. So that its total tax is $31,430, or 31 per cent of its excess profit, while the old foundry pays only 11 per cent of its excess profit. Bearing in mind that the excess profits of the two foundries are exactly the same in amount, that both foundries had during the prewar period the same capital, and were established in the same locality and, therefore, engaged in competition, and that each subsequently added equal amounts of additional capital, and that each will make within the current year equal amounts of profits, under the House bill and under my proposed amendment the two business units would pay exactly the same tax.

It may be said that, notwithstanding the new foundry earned the generous return of 10 per cent on its capital, it will be accorded the advantage of the earning capacity of the old foundry, on the theory that the earnings of the new foundry in comparison with foundries in general were low, and that the experience of the old foundry was fairly representative of the foundry trade. But if it be so said, then I say that the situation is made worse rather than better, because the discrimination then will not merely be between individual concerns in the same trade, but will be between each trade and line of business in this country; and, furthermore, that the discrimination will be the greater in proportion to the difference in the prosperity of the different trades and lines of business, notwithstanding that such difference is in a large measure due to or in any event greatly increased by the violent effect of the war during the years 1914 to 1916 on business in general, resulting as it did in the enrichment of many concerns in a comparatively few trades and lines of business and at the same time in the impoverishment of others. And this startling result, I submit, will be due not to the normal difference in the actual capital returns of different trades and kinds of business under normal conditions, but to the fact that certain concerns have reaped abnormal profits as a direct result of the war during the years 1914 to 1916, and from their abnormal profits have increased their capital, and in increasing their capital have automatically increased their exemptions. And I stress again that the benefit of the greater exemptions from taxation resulting in these cases, great as it is, is the smallest part of their benefit, because the rate of the tax on the amount of their taxable profits, diminished as they will be by their greater exemptions, is made at each step to advance not in proportion to the amount of the taxable profits but on the proportion of total profits to exempt profits, and therefore that the rate will be retarded in its progress in proportion as the exemption is the greater, while at the same time those concerns which have suffered most as the result of the war during the same years, and thereby suffered an impairment of their capital, will not only have their exemptions decreased on account of their misfortune but that the rate of taxation on their taxable profits will be correspondingly accelerated. Before leaving the two foundries I would have you remember that I have not assumed that the old and well-established foundry gained the status of a war bride. On the other hand, I have been altogether conservative in my assumptions. But there are war brides, and many of them, and if the old foundry should be assumed to be one, the resulting additions to its capital would exempt it from taxation altogether.

The committee, it would seem, in finding a new source of revenue and in formulating a new theory of determining what amount is taxable out of the new source of revenue, is obsessed with one idea to the practical exclusion of all other considerations, and that idea is that established earning capacity through the short period of three years ending more than three years ago, notwithstanding that such earning capacity is arbitrarily increased or diminished in proportion to any increase or decrease in capital resulting from subsequent prosperity or adversity, should furnish the basis not only of exemption from all subsequent taxation but should also furnish the controlling basis for graduating the rate of taxation on that which is taxable. It may be fair to repeat that the committee, in the main, undertakes to justify its plan on the experience of other countries employing similar plans. Let me say that, apart from all other considerations, there is one difference between the condition in this country and the condition of the countries which have employed this kind of legislation which makes every difference between our case and theirs. In their case there were no war profits and war losses for a three-year period, or indeed for any substantial period, before their legislation was framed and before they found themselves at war. In our case by this scheme, if adopted, we will grant exemption to those who have prospered during the three years of the war in proportion to their prosperity, since it must be assumed that additions to their capital have been made out of their prosperity; and then, under the plan of graduating the rate of taxation on such diminished profits as are taxable, we will retard the progress of the rate in proportion to the size of the exemption; and, on the other hand, we will decrease the exemption of those who have suffered during the same period in proportion to their adversity, since it must be assumed that the impairment of their capital has resulted from their adversity, and then accelerate the rate of their proportionately greater taxable profits because of their decreased exemptions. No such result could happen under a similar plan in Europe, because the countries adopting the plan went immediately into war from a wholly normal period. On the other hand, we go to war and frame our war-revenue legislation after three years of war in Europe, and those three years have had an effect on business in this country which is immeasurably and incomparably great. Indeed, it is fair to say that the greatest single factor in its effect on business in the entire history of this country has been the European war during the past three years. And there can be no reasonable analogy between two sets of conditions or between plans to meet those conditions when the greatest factor in one is entirely absent in the other. Indeed our condition is by this factor made so different from conditions in Europe when the war came on there that if we undertake to follow the European precedent we will, comparatively speaking, create exemptions from taxation in proportion to war profits and impose taxation in proportion to war losses.

This is a great and indeed an incomparable war. Our resources in men and money must be taxed to the utmost before we see it through, but we can not see it through on the basis of subsidizing prosperity and penalizing adversity. I have said that this is a great and incomparable war, and great as it is and incomparable as it is, it is being fought on our part and on the part of our allies in the cause of justice and of freedom and of equal rights and privileges and of equal duties and burdens. If this scheme of taxation is imposed it will not only apply most unjustly as between different trades and lines of business, but also as between concerns in the same line of business, and will utterly destroy equality of opportunity on the part of business men to serve both the Nation and themselves. I say it will destroy the equality of opportunity, because it is impossible that a new or comparatively new business slowly building and forging its way ahead can compete with an older and longer established business if the Government is to subsidize the one and strangle the other. And I say that all lines of business need to speed up and that those which are unjustly burdened can not keep pace with those which are unjustly favored.

If there must be differences in the rate of taxation on equal amounts fairly found to be subject to taxation—and I do not think there should be—I should certainly favor the lower rate to those who are least able to bear the burden and are struggling for a place in the race. And if there is to be discrimination between different trades and lines of business—and I do not think there should be—I would certainly favor discrimination in favor of those trades and lines which have suffered adversity as the result of the war during the period of the war rather than, as is the actual case under the committee's plan, in favor of those trades and lines of business which have prospered during the period of the war as a result of the war. But I say here, as I said in respect to the plan of exemption, that the rule of equality and of uniformity should apply in taxing this new source of revenue just as it has applied or ought to apply in the plan of taxing incomes, and indeed as it has applied and ought to apply in general to all taxation.

Mr. President, this bill is so manifestly unjust that I shall vote against it unless it is reconstructed along lines which seem to me to more equally and fairly distribute the burden of taxation.

This bill does not treat all alike. It does not give the man with the small profit a square deal. It is not fair to small business. The tax is based upon exemptions and not upon profits. It is highly obnoxious class legislation. This war can not be won by suppressing business industry. Unless some expansion is allowed in business, the growing needs of our armies at home and abroad can not be supplied. The fact should not be forgotten that we must consider the collection of taxes for more than one year. If we embarrass and strangle business this year, where is the excess or war profit to come from next year?

With the high cost of living there must be a margin left for increased wages and salaries. By suppressing business enterprise you make it impossible to meet the just requirements of labor. I protest against such a policy as unwise and unnecessary.

Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD in connection with my remarks the table to which I have referred as having been prepared by a recognized statistical expert whose duties have been in connection with the Government for a number of years. These figures show what the tax rate would be as the tax progresses. They also show that the plan of the amendment which I have submitted will raise about $70,000,000 more than will the plan of the committee, and will distribute the tax fairly and justly to all who ought to pay their share of the taxes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the table referred to by the Senator from Alabama will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears none.

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I am greatly indebted to the Senate for its patience. I have consumed much more time than I had intended, but the importance of this question so impressed me that I felt warranted in imposing upon the courtesy of the Senate. Of course, we shall hear much more of this question during the debate, for we have the promise that it will be explained to our satisfaction why large aggregations of capital and immense amounts of profits should be excused from taxation while small units will be compelled to pay from 25 to 40 or 50 per cent of their net earnings. This will be interesting. The Senate and the country will impatiently await the time when the advocates of the bill as reported to the Senate from the Committee on Finance will undertake to explain the justice and the fairness of its provisions and to tell the country how it applies equally and fairly and justly to all the people in the country. Mr. President, if I do not mistake the sentiment of the country, and if I do not misjudge the wisdom and the patriotism of this body, I must conclude that the writing on the statute books of this country of the provisions of the bill as they relate to the excess profits tax can never happen.

Of course, Mr. President, I have not dealt with every phase of this question; I have not undertaken to discuss all of the inequalities of the bill; I have not undertaken to show the Senate and the country how unjust and unfair it is in other respects. I have preferred to confine my remarks to one particular phase of the bill, that which I regard as the most important and the most utterly indefensible.

Now, Mr. President, I am going to ask to have a letter printed in the RECORD. I do not care to have it read. It is from a distinguished citizen and it bears on this question. I ask to have it printed in the RECORD, not as a part of my remarks, but for the information which it contains.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

JANESVILLE, WIS., August 13, 1917.

HON. JOHN H. BANKHEAD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I write in reference to the tax bill now pending in Congress and particularly relating to the subject of the tax on excess profits of corporations. I desire to call your attention to a condition which I believe will result disastrously to a large number of comparatively small corporations throughout the country. In a very heavy tax levy there is danger to corporations which are not in a financial position to withstand the shock. Too great a burden on current business should not be laid. A burden that may destroy business if laid on at one time may be borne if imposed by degrees.

In the present Senate bill it is proposed to tax the so-called excess profits of corporations earned in 1917 substantially 50 per cent in many cases. It is proposed to use as a basis for normal income the years 1911, 1912, and 1913, or at the option of the corporation, 6 per cent on the capital invested. I call your attention to a concrete case as an illustration of how this is going to work out with a large number of corporations. The one to which I refer has a very limited capital; it lost money in 1911, 1912, and 1913, but the people back of it proposed to save the corporation and went into their pockets or backed the credit of the corporation. In 1917, owing to a period of prosperity, the business became profitable. The concern to which I refer manufactures some household articles. It is as far removed from any munition feature as anything very well could be. The profits they are making this year are being used to pay up the indebtedness created heretofore. The books of this company will show the business this year to be profitable. It is too early to determine just what the profit is going to be, but they may run into the neighborhood of $25,000. As fast as earned, they are being paid to creditors. This particular concern is doing business largely on borrowed money. It is impossible to figure just what the tax would be, but according to the proposed schedule contained in that bill, their tax would be not less than from nine to ten thousand dollars. If that tax is imposed it would throw that particular company into the hands of a receiver, because it is not in a position to go out and borrow the money with which to pay the tax. Although they will show a profit on their books they will not have the money.

I will give you another illustration which comes within my knowledge: A corporation with $200,000 invested was not profitable during the test years, therefore compelled to use the 6 per cent basis. During the latter part of last year and this year its business has been and will be profitable, but in order to carry on that business it is compelled to reinvest its profits in plant and machinery and liquidate some of its debts. Under the proposed schedule, the tax against this company might run as high as $20,000. It has not and will not have the money with which to meet the tax. The nature of its business is such that it is compelled to continue its investments in plant and otherwise. It is using its full credit and the imposition of such a tax may drive that institution into bankruptcy.

I talked recently with a prominent banker in Chicago, who said that he knew of a number of institutions, that because they were having a good year this year, would be subject to a heavy tax under this proposed schedule and that the companies had used the money in their business in the usual manner, and would be unable to pay the tax except by borrowing the money, which many of them would be unable to do. He said that the imposition of this tax would curtail the credit of many corporations and that banks would be compelled to draw in on the credit of many corporations which were making money, but because of their financial condition they could not ride through such a tax imposition.

The proposed schedule penalizes a business because it will have during 1917 a prosperous year, and the penalty will be imposed in such a manner that many of the smaller corporations will be unable to stand up.

The most steadily prosperous corporations will not be affected. Take for example, the automobile industry which, I believe, is the second largest industry at the present time in the manufacturing line. This industry had great prosperity in 1911, 1912, and 1913 and made immense profits. It will make immense profits this year, but by reason of having prosperous years during the test years they will have little or no excess tax to pay.

The penalty is going to fall very heavily upon corporations which have had a struggle for existence during the depression since 1907, and have for the first time a chance to catch up in part for the losses of preceding years. Thousands of citizens of moderate means may be ruined financially by the imposition of such an unjust tax.

If it is the policy of Congress to pay the war expenses by current taxes, let Congress put a heavy straight percentage upon corporate profits so that all—the rich and the poor, the large and the small corporations—will pay in the same ratio. There are many lines of business that have had no period of prosperity since 1907 until the later part of 1916, and if Congress imposes such a tax as is proposed many of the small corporations will not be able to pay that tax for the reason that such profits as they may have made have either been used to liquidate indebtedness or have been used to bring their plants back into condition and the profits themselves are not available with which to pay the tax.

It seems to me that any man who has had any business experience must realize that there is a large percentage of the corporations of the country in this condition. These corporations to which I refer have had no advantage from munition manufacture, nor have they had any advantage from the world-war conditions. Their prosperity has come from a general stimulation of trade, and only so far as the war may have stimulated trade generally have they in anywise benefited from the war conditions.

Theoretically it may sound well enough to place taxes upon a percentage basis, but any percentage to small, struggling corporations or individuals may mean a very different thing from what the same percentage means to prosperous corporations or individuals. It may mean ruin to one and only a curtailment of dividends or disbursements to the other. It seems to me that Congress should take this into consideration. Let Congress put a straight tax of 10 per cent on corporate profits up to $100,000 and then go on to a percentage basis. While this would be severe upon many of the smaller corporations, it still would permit them to remain solvent. The severity of an injury is determined sometimes by the capacity of the injured to receive it. A blow that may jostle a man might kill a child. This rule applies in business, and a tax that might make a large corporation feel a financial pinch may be fatal to other corporations which are not financially in a position to stand the tax. It may look fair enough to say to every corporation that 50 per cent of the profits they have made in 1917 may be taken for governmental uses, and a corporation which is in a financial position to pay that 50 per cent might not be seriously affected by it, but a corporation that may have been compelled to expend its profits day by day as it has gone along may not be in a position to raise the money to pay what appears by its books to have been its annual profit. There is a vast difference between money profits deposited in a bank and paper profits, which merely show upon the books of a corporation. I predict financial disaster to a large number of people unless Congress finds some way to recognize the difference between actual money profits and paper profits, which of necessity must remain in the business. The proposed plan has in it the elements that may bring financial disaster to thousands just because they are not in a four-handed financial position.

One more illustration of an actual case, with figures as nearly correct as can be stated at this time: A business started since 1910. The average profits for 1911, 1912, and 1913 about $5,000. This year probable profits $55,000. Excess, $50,000. The excess tax would amount to $22,857.50, to which is added an income tax of 6 per cent, or $3,300, making a total tax of $26,157.50. These profits, as every business man realizes, are not in money. Some of it has gone into reducing indebtedness, some into plant, some into increased inventory, made necessary by the expanding business, and probably the entire balance into accounts receivable, owing to expanding business. Probably the cash balance carried by this company is not much, if any, larger than ever. If this company were compelled to pay $26,157.50 in taxes at one time it would require a liquidation of its business and probably under force through a receiver. It would have been better for this company not to have made more than a normal profit, because in that event it could at least remain solvent. This company has never paid a dividend, and can not this year, regardless of the tax, as the profits will be permanently tied up in its business. This is another case of paper or book profit. This company might be able to declare a stock dividend, which would cost it nothing and would not increase its obligations, but still not be in a position to pay any cash dividend whatever, because that will interfere with its ability to finance itself. You realize that the financing of a business is sometimes its most delicate operation. Give these companies a chance to get their breath before you throw onto them a burden they are unable to bear. The proposed tax will injure a multitude of individuals and in the end will be detrimental to the whole country.

Respectfully, yours,

M. G. JEFFRIS.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I had intended to make some reference to the woolgrowers' interest and also to the cattle-growers' interest in this bill; but I did not have the figures as I now have. I am going to prepare a table in which I shall show what the effect of this provision of the bill will be upon the woolgrowers and the cattle growers of the country. I think I shall be able to show that the rate of taxation will be at least 50 per cent on their net earnings. I shall furnish the figures later.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, permission to do so will be granted.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I had not intended to address the Senate upon this bill. The Finance Committee, however, has included as one of the features of the bill a provision suspending the drawback on sugar. Two days ago, during my enforced absence from the Senate, my friend the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who is a member of the Finance Committee, in addressing the Senate directed some remarks in opposition to the provision reported by the committee suspending the drawback on sugar. Those remarks of opposition by the Senator to the provision in the bill are but partial, so far as I could judge them and as I read them in the RECORD, and I shall deal with those remarks as I progress in pointing out to the Senate the importance and fairness of preserving this provision in the bill.

Before doing that, however, I desire to say that in the course of those remarks several Senators injected questions directed to the Senator from Utah. I shall deal with those questions, because they have a great deal to do with the argument which I propose to present to the Senate in support of this provision.

The burden of the Senator's remarks was directed to show that if this provision were enacted into law, if the drawback were suspended, the general effect on the price of sugar upon the American market would be an advance of half a cent a pound.

I notice that the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] expressed some anxiety over the fact that if this provision were enacted into law there would be danger that our allies in Europe, particularly England, would be compelled to use washed sugar instead of using refined sugar. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that there is a universal demand in England to-day for the privilege of being permitted to use washed sugar instead of the sugar that is now being sold to the British trade.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, will not the Senator at this point explain to the Senate the difference between refined and washed sugar?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Yes, sir; I shall take great pleasure in explaining the difference.

Sugars known as washed sugars are made into either granulated or yellow clarified or white sugars in one continuous process of manufacture, embracing the crushing of the sugar cane, the boiling of the juice, and the granulation of the sugar. The washing is done while the sugar is in process of separating the grain, the crystallized part, from the molasses. It is done in the centrifugal, the motion of which is very rapid, and the sugar is dashed against a screen on the inside of the receptacle. As the revolutions proceed the liquid is forced through a fine screen into the outer receptacle and the grain remains attached to the screen. While this revolution is going on, if pure, clear water is forced against the sugar, the particles of molasses are driven away from the sugar and you make either a fine yellow clarified or a granulated sugar. That is termed "washed sugar." It is the purest sugar possible; there can be no purer sugar.

Refined sugar is a sugar—mostly unclean—which has first been manufactured to a given state with all of its impurities, including a great deal of molasses, still attached to the grain because of the failure to wash these impurities from the grain as the operation of crystallization proceeds. Then the refiner takes the sugar and remelts it. After having remelted it he strains it through bone black, which is a charcoal made out of the charred bones of animals. Sugar is clarified in that way. It is then granulated and is known as refined sugar. It is not nearly as clean a sugar as is the washed sugar, nor is it so desirable, as the Senator from New Hampshire will perceive.

Prime yellow clarified sugars or plantation granulated sugars are washed sugars; Domino sugars, cube sugar, pulverized sugars, and all sugars made by the refiners have gone through the process of clarification by passing through charcoal made out of the bones of animals. That is the difference between the two.

I am sorry that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is not here, but I want to read into the RECORD, because it will have considerable to do with the further remarks which I shall make in connection with this provision, an article from the International Sugar Journal, published in London, of date June, 1917. It appears in the last but one issue of this recognized authoritative publication upon the question of sugar. The article is as follows:

RAW VERSUS REFINED SUGAR.

On another page we report the substance of some questions and answers in Parliament regarding the alleged impurities found in the imports of raw cane sugar into this country during the last few months. It is seriously asserted by the authorities that consignments of sugar (of unnamed origin) contain the sugar louse (Acarus sacchari), and are hence unfit for putting into direct consumption. It is also alleged that the raw Cuban sugars landed here contain physical impurities. Hence the Government in their rôle of wholesale sugar dealers plus food controllers deem it expedient that this sugar should all pass through the hands of the already well-employed refineries.

Until more evidence is forthcoming to prove that this charge is well founded and is not the result of analyzing an odd sack or two of a few abnormal imports, it will be hard to convince the sugar-making interests that there is enough justification here for holding back a good deal of reputed high-class raw sugar till it can be refined. On the contrary, there will be a suspicion engendered that the refining interests are unduly swaying the decisions of the sugar commission and that more sugar is being refined than there is need for. Our refineries in normal times are not of sufficient capacity to deal with all our requirements in refined; and even if nowadays, owing to the restricted consumption they be not fully employed, that is hardly a reason for passing through them (as we have some good reason to believe has lately been done) a number of raw-sugar consignments quite fit for direct consumption, for the sufficient grounds amongst others that there is a general complaint as to the scarcity of sugar amongst domestic consumers, and the scarcity will not be lessened by the delay in refining or in the reduction in bulk by one-tenth through that process. For this reason we hold that the question of what sugar, as imported, is reasonably fit to go immediately into direct consumption is one that should receive the most independent investigation possible.

The matter is one of more than ordinary import, because whereas till a few years ago the vast bulk of the sugar consumed in this country had perforce to undergo refining, either in the country of origin, e. g., in Germany and Austria, or else on arrival in this country, the necessity does not now hold equally good. With the recent introduction of improved methods of washing and curing in the raw cane sugar centrals, an increasing output of raw sugar sufficiently fit for direct consumption has developed, especially in Java, the home of the so-called "plantation white sugar." This sugar naturally dispenses with the final refining process using animal charcoal and therefore is in direct antagonism to the refiner's interests. But as it will fetch a higher price, it is in the producer's interests to turn it out and market it if he can. Hence if the Government is going to stand sponsor for our sugar supply in the future, it will have to consider the claims of the raw-sugar producers in our colonies and elsewhere as well as of the refiner at home. It is not in the interests of the former that the public of this country should be educated into the belief that raw cane sugar is an impure product which must necessarily undergo refining. There will be equally a big demand for direct-consumption sugars once the public realize that a sugar of that kind may be quite pure enough even though its color is a less clean white than that of refined.

The history of sugar in the United States is largely a struggle between the refining and the producing interests in which the former have always endeavored to get the monopoly of all the sugar entering into the States; and for many years, it is interesting to note the United States refiners boomed the Acarus sacchari— for all it was worth as a conclusive illustration of the necessity for issuing nothing but refined sugar to the consumer. A study of the history of the struggle between those refining interests and the producers who wished to be independent of that monopoly would, we take it, not be without benefit to those Government departments at home who are nowadays having to try and master the technics of the sugar industry to a degree that is without precedent for them.

I put this whole article into the RECORD because it shows that the present demand of the British trade is for washed sugar. I propose to show later on that the same campaign that was conducted in this country by the refiners to create a prejudice in favor of refined sugar and against the production of the class of sugar that the British trade wants and about which the Senator from Massachusetts showed solicitude in his question to the Senator from Utah, is now being conducted in England in order to conserve that market to the refiners of this country and to permit them to dominate the market not only here but throughout the world. The Senator from Massachusetts indicated some solicitude about this in the question he addressed to the Senator from Utah, but as to this feature of the matter I will defer discussion.

Another interjection into the speech of the Senator from Utah was made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], who is generally advised with regard to the sugar situation. The Senator from Utah proceeded in the effort which is common with the sugar refiners, to frighten people away from the thought that anyone else can supply sugar to anybody in this or any other country except themselves, by stating that if they do not furnish it, some semibarbarous people somewhere in some unknown land will furnish that sugar. While the Senator was proceeding to state how, if we suspend the drawback, England would get sugar from some other country, the Senator from Georgia injected a suggestion with regard to Java sugar—"Java plantation white," as it is referred to in the article in the International Sugar Journal, from which I have quoted.

I turn to the International Sugar Journal of the month of July, 1917, the last number, and I find referred to a difficulty which it is important to bear in mind as we proceed with an analysis of this situation. I find the reasons stated by the best-informed journal on that subject to be in accord with the statement of the Senator from Georgia, and to that extent to have demolished the argument of the Senator from Utah. It is a brief paragraph, and I wish to read it in order to get it into the RECORD. I read from the last month's issue with regard to British conditions:

The supply of sugar for the United Kingdom continues to be dependent upon the facilities for shipping from over-seas sources, as well as on the success or otherwise of sugar cargoes running the gantlet of the U-boats. The latter have had their successes as well as their failures; and it was recently given out by a member of the Government that we had lost within recent months 40,000 tons of sugar from enemy action. Cuba has to all appearances been our main source of supply, as the scarcity of shipping has tended to make the transportation of Java sugar from the East a matter of difficulty. It is a better policy to send ships the shorter voyage to the West Indies than the longer one to Java; so, sugar from the latter country is necessarily held up till the shipping shortage is rendered less pressing.

However, there is sufficient sugar coming into the country to enable the consumer on the whole to get his rations—

And so forth.

I desire to corroborate the statement of the Senator from Georgia to the effect that there can be no possibility, until there is an improvement of the transporting facilities, for Great Britain or France to draw any quantity of sugar from Java. That sugar must come from the West Indies; that sugar is now coming from the West Indies, and that sugar will continue coming from the West Indies, and no sugar will go from Java to Great Britain or to France until the entire supply of American sugar and sugar from the islands of the West Indies have been exhausted.

Another interjection into the remarks of the Senator from Utah was made by my friend the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS]. The inquiry propounded by him was quite logical, because it would seem on the face of the papers that there would be difficulty in recognizing a policy which would suspend the drawback on sugar and maintain it on other manufactured articles. I want to call the attention of the Senator——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator referred to what I said when speaking on this question as indicating that I had a thought that England would get her sugar from Java. I do not know where the Senator got any such impression.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I got the impression from the fact that the Senator from Georgia assured the Senator from Utah that there was not sufficient shipping to bring that sugar there, and I judged that there must have been some fear in the mind of the Senator that Java sugar would displace American refined sugar in the British trade.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to disabuse the Senator's mind as to that. If the Senator had taken pains to read my remarks——

Mr. BROUSSARD. I have read them two or three times, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I will say that the Senator can not find one word in what I said that would lead him or anyone else to believe that I thought that Java sugar was going to England to take the place of the sugar that we were refining. I stated time and again that the sugar that had been refined in this country for England and France came from Cuba, and the only question as to whether or not it would continue to come here was raised by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that, if it was not refined here, the same sugar that we had been refining would go direct to England and be used as washed sugar.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I am glad that the Senator does not contend that the sugar will come from Java, because that obviates my spending the time in demonstrating that such a thing can not occur. We are in agreement upon that and it is not so important as to warrant a discussion at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. It never entered the mind of the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Utah agrees perfectly with the question that was suggested by the Senator from Georgia. Every sugar journal has stated for the last two or three months that it was practically impossible to procure shipping transportation to get the sugar that is in Java to-day into the world's market; and to-day sugar is cheaper in Java than it has been for years for the very reason that transportation is impossible to secure.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I hope the Senator will make disclaimers as to some other parts of the argument which he has advanced when I attack them.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Utah did not advance this as an argument and that is the reason he interrupted the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I will reach that part of the criticism of the Senator's remarks and I express the hope that I may be mistaken as to what he advanced on the floor as an argument against the repeal of the drawback provision. I now want to call to the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] the fact that the drawback taken out of the Treasury under the provision referred to is infinitesimal with reference to everything else except sugar. For instance, I want to call his attention to the fact that automobiles in 1916 only withdrew $36,000. I want to call his atention to the fact that beer only withdrew $2,000; carpets $4.53; cartridges only $10,000; and the same small sums apply to innumerable other articles. I want to call his especial attention to the one article to which he referred, and that is silks. The drawback on silks is as follows:

On silk chiffon it is only $31.18.
On silk voiles it is $2,786.
On silk and mohair yarn it is $3,511.
On artificial silk it is $13,000.
On silk dyed it is $80.
On silk embossed, $13.
On silk ribbons, $37.15.

These are all infinitesimal figures. Compared with that is the drawback on sugar, which runs up into the millions and covers over 90 per cent of all drawbacks. There are hundreds of articles upon which drawbacks are allowed. The document presented by the Secretary of the Treasury in response to my resolution in the Sixty-fourth Congress, Document No. 532, shows the entire list of articles upon which drawbacks are allowed, representing our entire export trade, and yet, all combined, they do not amount to more than a small fraction of the drawback on sugar. Sugar absorbs practically all of the drawback paid out of the United States Treasury, and the use made by the sugar refiner of the drawback provision of the tariff act is objectionable from every point of view. On the other hand, all other American manufacturing industries are utilizing the principle of the drawback in the manner in which the law intended that it should be utilized, and of course the drawbacks in those instances should not be suspended. With the solitary exception of the sugar refiners the manufacturers in the country are availing themselves of the law according to the provision of the drawback of the tariff in a legitimate way. It is not being used to boost up prices here. It is not being used to extract money from the Treasury and then collect the same sum from the purchaser. It is not being used to beat down the price of competitors in this country. The sugar-refining combine of the country is the only institution that uses the drawback for the illegal purposes which I have just described. I propose to show just how they use this drawback; how they use it to affect the price of raw sugar here and abroad; how they use it to beat down competition with the producers of beet sugar in the West and the producers of cane sugar in the South; how they use it to raise the price to every man, woman, and child in this country; how they use this drawback in every way imaginable; and they alone, of all the numbers of manufacturers that avail themselves of the privilege of the drawback, abuse that power in a shameful manner.

Now, let us see how much drawback there is. Of course, I need not describe at length what the drawback is, but to make the matter clearer, let me state this:

The drawback is a sum of money representing the tariff duty paid upon a given article which, after being manufactured, if exported, is returned to the man who pays it. In other words, when a man brings a ton of sugar into a refinery in the United States on which he has paid duty, if after having refined it he ships it abroad, he gets back that duty, less 1 per cent for the cost of administration.

Now, let us see how this drawback has jumped up.

In 1912 the entire drawback on sugar was only $1,900,105.

In 1913 it was $1,058,789.

In 1914, the first year of the war, it was $1,265,315.

In 1915, after the war was on, it jumped up to $9,650,097.

In 1916 it jumped up to $19,801,513.

For the half year ending June 30, 1917, from the 1st of January, 1916, the statement sent me by the Secretary of the Treasury amounts to $24,142,286.29.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I was called from the Chamber. Has the Senator explained why that has jumped so much this year?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I have not, but I propose to explain it.

Now, looking over the report of the Secretary with regard to this drawback we find that the total drawback in 1915 was $7,346,000, in round figures. Of this total the sugar drawback was $5,096,000, in round figures, and practically that same proportion is maintained for the other years. The proportion of drawbacks upon all the hundreds of other articles making up our export trade is, as I stated a while ago, less than 10 per cent of the entire amount paid out of the Treasury in drawbacks. If we bear in mind the purpose of the drawback, it is very clear to us that the withdrawal of practically all this money as drawback on sugar does not adapt itself or fit itself into the purpose for which the law was enacted. The purpose of the drawback is to permit a man who manufactures an article in the United States from a raw article upon which he has paid a duty to compete with another article on a foreign market without having to bear the burden of that duty. It is remitted to him in order to permit him to compete with a foreigner upon a foreign market. So the automobile maker who ships an automobile from here to England meets the competition of the domestic manufacturer there, or the other foreign competitor in automobiles, say, made in France; and he is permitted to withdraw whatever amount of taxes he may have paid on any part of the raw material in that machine in order to lessen his cost and permit him to compete upon the foreign market. But, so far as sugar is concerned, there never has been a moment since the war started that the American refiner has had a competitor upon the market that he has found as the result of this war.

Prior to the war the British people, for instance, consumed 1,700,000 tons of sugar, in round figures. Of that amount, 700,000 tons were refined in the refineries in England, and a million tons were brought into the country principally from Germany and Austria. Of course, this war has cut off the supply of sugar from Austria and Germany, and the British public have had to turn somewhere else for this sugar. They could turn to no other place to get it except here. They could have secured a great deal of it, most of it, all of it, from Java but for the difficulties of transportation which I explained a while ago. So, they had to turn to Cuba to get that sugar; but, inasmuch as the Cuban crop is made into a raw sugar, and not into a refined sugar, and inasmuch as the American refineries take practically the entire crop of Cuban sugar, bring it here, and refine it, they have to come to the United States to buy this sugar. They are buying this sugar in the United States. There is no competitor for this sugar. They are not going anywhere else to get this sugar. They are coming here to get it. They are not buying it from anybody else. They are buying it from the American refiners. They are not buying it from the beet producers in the West, because that sugar, under the operation of the drawback, is penalized if it goes abroad. It is then competing against the Cuban sugar upon which the refiner receives out of the Treasury 1 cent for every pound he sends abroad, but which the beet man is not permitted to receive. Therefore, he can not use the export market. The Englishman and the Frenchman who are here to buy sugar for the British people and the French people can not buy domestic sugar, because that sugar receives no bounty out of the Treasury for its exportation, while the refiner has a sugar upon which a bounty is paid him; and, therefore, he elbows out of the way the domestic producer, and holds that market in his own hands.

Here, at a time when we are taxing everything imaginable in this country, are these refiners drawing out of the Treasury over 20 million dollars, and drawing it out for what purpose? The law says the drawback is for the purpose of permitting them to compete upon the market where they are selling that sugar; but they are selling that sugar on a market where there is no other man from any other country offering any sugar in competition with it. Does not that make it absolutely a bounty, and, as a matter of fact, does not the refiner absorb that 1 cent, and not give it to the purchaser, which he would do if he had a competitor to meet upon the British market?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. BROUSSARD. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator has just made a statement that I believe he will want to change after he reconsiders it, and that is that the refiners of sugars in this country are selling the drawback sugar to the people of the United States. The Senator does not mean that, does he?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I did not understand the Senator's question. Will he kindly repeat it?

Mr. SMOOT. As I understood the Senator, he stated that the sugar refiners were selling to the people of the United States the sugar upon which they received a drawback.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Oh, no; I did not say that.

Mr. SMOOT. I knew the Senator would not intentionally make such a statement.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I said that the refiners were selling sugar in the United States to the British public. They are not shipping that sugar to England, to be sold there on the open market. They sell it here, and then ship it and collect the drawback.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, well, certainly.

Mr. BROUSSARD. That is the method. The agents of the British Government and the French Government are right here, buying this sugar. They are taking no chances on it. They sell it right here; and then, after they have sold the sugar, they go to the Treasury and withdraw the drawback on that sugar.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows this, however—that there is not one single cent of drawback returned to the sugar refiners of the country unless that sugar, that has been imported and the duty paid upon it, is exported.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Oh, yes; everybody understands that, I imagine—it must be exported.

Mr. SMOOT. I wanted to get that straight.

Mr. BROUSSARD. But the proposition that I advance is that in this instance this drawback, so far as sugar is concerned, is purely a bounty, a bounty which the American people have repudiated. It has been attempted in this country, and it has been repudiated by the American people. This drawback is purely a bounty, paid to whom? Paid to a handful of people engaged in refining, washing, laundering sugar on the seaboard.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I can take the quotations of sugar in England before this drawback provision was brought to the attention of the Senate, and also the quotations of the same identical sugar-refining company to the sugar consumer or purchaser in the United States, and the difference between the quotations is just exactly the difference of the tariff upon the sugar. Now, I can show, if the Senator desires, and the Senate, the telegrams daily for a solid month, and the quotations for London were less the amount of the tariff and added to the price at which sugar was sold to the American consumer.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Let me ask the Senator a question. What does he call the tariff? What tariff does he refer to—the British tariff?

Mr. SMOOT. No; our tariff on Cuban sugars.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Oh, well, sugar is selling in England for 6 pence, 6½, and 7 pence, which is 14 and 15 cents, and it is selling here at only 8½, 9, or 10 cents. It sells for twice as much in England, and here are the quotations in this volume. Sugar is selling in England at 6½ and 7 pence, and the Senator can not quote me cablegrams from London showing that sugar is selling cheaper or as cheaply there as it is here.

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator misunderstood me. I said that the American sugar refiners were selling sugar to England for a less price than they were selling it to the American people——

Mr. BROUSSARD. If that is correct, I want them to stop that.

Mr. SMOOT. And the difference between them is just the amount of the tariff.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I want them to stop that. They have no right to sell to anyone, allies or nonallies, sugar cheaper than they sell it to the American public. We are here trying to protect our own people. We are not asking for the refiners to grant us any favors against our allies; but they have no right, under the sanction of law, to sell sugar cheaper to a foreigner than they sell it to an American consumer; and they do it through the manipulation of the drawback which the Senator was defending the other day upon the floor of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, they do it because of the fact that our allies are not compelled to pay the duty that is imposed by the American people upon sugars imported into this country. If the Senator has his way, not only will England and France and our other allies pay the duty that is imposed upon sugar imported into this country, but they will also have to pay the consumption tax that is imposed in this bill.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Let me ask the Senator this question: Is the Senator opposed—if he is, I have not read it in his remarks—to the British consumer of American refined sugar, or the French consumer of American refined sugar, paying the excise tax which he has put on the same plane as this drawback?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, of course I think it is unjust. I think it is unjust for this reason, that the sugar that the English Government purchases from Cuba simply passes through America and is refined on the way. It is unjust for America now to say to England, our ally, "Because of the fact that you have been purchasing beet sugar in the past from Germany and from Austria and from France and from Russia, and now the war prevents you from doing it and you are compelled to turn to America to have it refined, we are going to compel you to pay a cent and a half a pound on it."

Mr. BROUSSARD. Oh, but the Senator knows that that is not true.

Mr. SMOOT. It is true.

Mr. BROUSSARD. It is not; and the Senator, if he knows anything about the situation, knows that I know that. I can make the situation so plain to him and to any other Senator that there will be no mistake about the proposition. Does the Senator mean to say that the American refineries are now deducting the drawback from the price of sugar sold to the British and the French Governments?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator means to say that, and he can prove it to the satisfaction of the Senator from Louisiana or the Senate or the United States.

Mr. BROUSSARD. The Senator proposes to prove that very thing?

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I say, that I can prove it.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Now, Mr. President, I object to being longer interrupted. I do not want to engage in that sort of discussion; but the matter is susceptible of absolute proof. There can be no question about it. The Senator simply disturbs the manner of my argument, the manner of presenting this matter; but I shall meet it now, just as well as later on.

Here is the situation with regard to the purchase of sugar, or the supposed competition for the purchase of sugar between the American consumer and, say, the British consumer. Here is the refiner that has, say, a thousand tons of sugar for sale, and here is an American consumer, an American jobber on the market to buy a thousand tons of sugar. Here is a British jobber to buy a thousand tons of sugar. Now, let us see how this transaction proceeds.

The American jobber says to the refiner: "I am in the market for a thousand tons of sugar. At what price can I get it?" The refiner says: "You can get it at 8 cents a pound, or 9 cents a pound, or 7 cents a pound," as the case may be. The price is satisfactory to the American jobber; but the British jobber says: "I will give you the same price for the same sugar. I will give you 8 cents a pound, or 9 cents, or 7 cents a pound," as the case may be. Now, let me ask anyone who grasps a business proposition to answer this question: To whom would he, as a refiner, sell that sugar? If he sells it to the American jobber, he gets exactly the price he enumerated in the contract. If he sells it to the British consumer, he gets it for that same price, plus 1 cent for every pound out of the Treasury. Who gets the sugar? Why, clearly the British consumer gets the sugar. Clearly a man conducting a big business enterprise is not so insane as to say that he will take 8 cents from an American customer when he can get 9 cents for the same thing from a British customer.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President—

Mr. BROUSSARD. I hope the Senator will not disturb me now. He has upset the argument which I wanted to make. I want to finish this line of argument before I touch another.

Mr. SMOOT. I will not interrupt the Senator further.

Mr. BROUSSARD. If any of you gentlemen were refiners, and I and another person should come and make a proposition to you, and offer you 8 cents for 1,000 tons of sugar, and in the one case you would be entitled to recover out of the Treasury a cent for every pound you sold that man, and in the other case you would not be entitled to recover anything, do you not know that you would sell it to the other man, and that you would absorb the cent? That is exactly what a refiner does. That is what he has been doing. That is what he received $24,000,000 for, this last year, of taxes legitimately collected from him into the Treasury. For giving the preference in the transaction to a foreigner over a man of his own country he is paid that bounty, and collects it and absorbs it and distributes it, together with the other profits which he makes, legitimately and illegitimately, in the business of refining.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. BROUSSARD. I yield to the Senator, but I am not through with the argument.

Mr. NORRIS. I will wait, if the Senator prefers.

Mr. BROUSSARD. No; go ahead.

Mr. NORRIS. I am asking purely for information. I am very much interested in what the Senator is saying, but I want to ask this question: In the case the Senator put, would it not be necessary for the foreigner to buy his sugar in a foreign country like Cuba and bring it into the United States to have it refined; and would he not have to give bond under the law that he would take the same sugar out after it was refined, so that he could not make sale of it here afterwards?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Oh, no; I will state to the Senator that he can not refine sugar under bond. The trust has been trying to get that privilege, and they asked that under this bill, they be permitted to refine sugar under bond. They have no such authority and they do not do it. They can not do it.

Mr. NORRIS. In the case the Senator puts the sugar that he would sell to the Englishman, for instance, has to be, of course, the same identical sugar that came from a foreign market?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Yes; certainly. All domestic sugars are closed out of this foreign market by the operation of the drawback.

Mr. NORRIS. When they bring that sugar in to refine it, is there no obligation under the law by which they have to take the same sugar out?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Oh, yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Or could they leave it in, after they got it refined, and sell it here?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Oh, yes; but the Senator will understand that at least one-half of the sugar consumed in this country is sugar of the class of which we are speaking now.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I have understood that.

Mr. BROUSSARD. And so far as that half is concerned those conditions exist; and through those conditions the refiners are permitted to draw this money out of the Treasury, at a time when we are taxing everything in order to get sufficient money to carry on this great war in which we are engaged.

The position of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is that in the same case which I have submitted, the refiner would say to the British and to the American, "Well, while it is true, Mr. British Jobber, that if you will give me 8 cents for this sugar I could get 9 cents, still I am so patriotic that I prefer to sell it to the American consumer and get only 8 cents for it." Does any one believe that that transaction has ever taken place? And if he looks into the character of the men conducting the refining business in this country, does he believe that it ever will take place?

There is the entire situation in regard to the drawback. It is taken out of the Treasury to feed these stockholders of the refining interests. It is ostensibly given in order to reduce the price to the foreign purchaser—in this instance our allies—but it is absorbed right out of the Treasury of the United States into the treasury of the refining combine. Not a cent of it, not a fraction of a cent, ever finds its way into reducing the price of sugar to the foreign purchaser of that sugar. But that is not the worst of it. After that is done, what happens? Let me take the same case to illustrate it further.

The American jobber says to the refiner, "I am an old customer of yours. I have customers that depend upon my having this supply which I get from you. I am a standing customer. I have been doing business with you for a long time, and I propose to continue doing business with you. The man who bought this sugar only came here because he could not buy it anywhere else. He has been in the habit of buying that sugar from Germany and from Austria. He would not buy it from you now unless he were compelled to buy it from you. He can not buy it from Germany and Austria. He can not get it from Java, because he has no ships to get it. He can not get it from Canada, because they have none to export. He can not get it from Cuba, because they have no refineries there, and he wants refined sugar. Now, I still want my 1,000 tons of sugar. Can you give it to me?" The answer is, "Why, yes; next week I will have a thousand tons of sugar that I can sell to you."

Then the American jobber says, "Very well; next week I will come here and get the sugar." Then Mr. Refiner says, "Hold on a minute; I can not sell you at 8 cents because next week this same man who bought that sugar for which he paid me 8 cents and for which transaction I received from the Treasury another cent, making 9 cents, will be here to get another thousand tons and he will again offer me 8 cents plus one cent bounty which the Government gives me under the drawback. I therefore can get 9 cents for it. Yes, I will sell you that thousand tons of sugar next week. You are a good customer and I want to see your business continue and prosper, but you will have to pay me 9 cents for that sugar or I will hold it and sell it to the Frenchmen or the Englishmen and I will get 9 cents out of the transaction." So while this refiner is absorbing the drawback, giving him the special privilege of competing with foreign manufacturers on the foreign market, he is at the same time applying this drawback to draw out of the public an equivalent of the drawback for every pound of sugar eaten by every man, woman, and child in the United States.

The Senator from Utah is prone to say, sugar yields $52,000,000 annually to the Treasury. That is not so. There is collected $52,000,000 duty, but the trust comes back and draws out of the Treasury as we see here $20,000,000 drawback from that amount. Then, to reimburse itself for the balance of the $52,000,000 and after taking back this $20,000,000 it proceeds to collect out of the consumer and under the same law by which it collects this money out of the Treasury it taxes every man, woman, and child in the country in order to make good the drawback for every pound of sugar which it imports. The duty on sugar imposed by the tariff act is a nullity, so far as the refiner is concerned, and will continue to be a nullity, yielding little profit to the Treasury; enhancing the value of sugar to the American consumer and giving nothing to the foreign purchasers of the American refined sugar who happen to be our allies in this war, so long as the drawback remains upon the statute books.

Worse than that, the refiners use this provision of the law not only for the purpose of absorbing the drawback, not only for the purpose of making additional profit on the value of the sugar apart from the market price; use it not only for the purpose of assessing every man, woman, and child in this country who eats a pound of sugar, but they use it for a legal weapon for the purpose of beating down the price of raw sugar which they purchase in Louisiana; of beating down the price of raw sugar which they purchase from the Philippine Islands, from Hawaii, and from Porto Rico.

We have heard a good deal about people who play both ends against the middle, but the Sugar Trust plays both ends and the middle, too. They collect taxes from the American consumer, absorb it from the foreign purchaser, and then they use that to beat down the price of the domestic raw sugar. That is the profit the trust gets out of the sugar—this concern that does not produce anything at all, that neither toils nor spins, but takes another man's production and launders it at some of the seaboard cities. The refiners' profit consists in the difference between the price of raw sugar and the price of refined sugar, and the greater the difference between the two the greater profit he derives.

I have shown that he can use this drawback to collect out of the people the amount of money which is to be paid in taxes into the Treasury as a tariff duty, which he draws out of the Treasury when he exports the refined sugar. If he can use it for the further purpose of beating down the price of raw sugar then his situation is ideal, and he does all three of these things. He has bought raw sugar in Louisiana for the last twenty years at from twenty to forty points below the price of Cuban sugar, even though Louisiana sugar is admittedly a better sugar for his purposes than Cuban sugar. He has used it outrageously to depress prices in that State, is doing so now, and through the medium of a drawback has gotten himself involved in a suit with planters in Louisiana, and only recently paid $750,000 in damages for a settlement amicably of the suit. He has a contract with the people of Hawaii by which he buys their sugar at ten points below the Cuban price. He buys the Porto Rican crop, and he buys the Philippine sugar that comes here at a difference of ten to twenty points below the price which he pays for foreign sugar, and he does it all by virtue of the fact that he holds this leverage in the drawback.

Let me point out that when this proposition was first brought to the attention of the Finance Committee the refiner did not expect that the Finance Committee would take the view that the committee finally took, but just as soon as it became noised through the press that the committee was looking with some favor upon the proposition which I have advanced with regard to this drawback, then these refiners commenced to pour into Washington. They and their agents and their attorneys, the miners and sappers for this great trust, the workers underground, and the fugel men of the concern all came to Washington. I do not know what they said to the Finance Committee because I was not there, but I know they must have been there several times because some one on the committee did me the honor each time to call me before the committee to answer some of the arguments advanced by the refiners in opposition to this drawback proposition. Let me show you the evolution of the arguments advanced by the refiners in order to maintain this iniquitous provision through which they manipulate the world market.

When the proposition was first called to the attention of the Finance Committee and the advance guard of the refining combine appeared in Washington they took the position that if this drawback were suspended the refiners would move their refineries to Cuba; that they were not going to refine sugar in this country if they did not have the benefit of the drawback; they were going to Cuba. They advanced that argument. Nobody believed they were going to do that.

They have millions and millions of dollars invested in these refineries. They are located here. Their business is here. Their force is organized. They do not know how much longer this war will last. Nobody believed that they were going to Cuba. They knew if they refined their sugar in Cuba that in transporting it to the United States the quality of that sugar would be affected by the humidity on board ship. So, when this was presented to the committee and the committee became convinced that they were not going over to Cuba, they came back with a declaration that all the sugar now being sold refined in the United States would be refined in England. The committee became worried to find out whether that would happen.

I brought to the attention of the committee a letter from one of the foremost sugar experts in the world, an Englishman living in England. Generally speaking, this authority would be accepted as to any country, but as to England he was unquestionably the foremost authority to decide the threat made by the refiners as to the possibility of refining all this sugar in England. I secured a copy of a letter written by this great expert on the 18th of May of this year. I shall read it so that there may be no misunderstanding with regard to the effect of the repeal of the drawback and to show that the prediction of the refiners can not possibly happen.

This letter is as follows:

GOMSHALL LODGE,
Gomshall, May 18, 1917.

DEAR MR. ———: I hasten to reply to yours of April 21, though the reply is only preliminary, as I must try to get detailed facts. In my old age I am away from business circles, but, as you see by the inclosed book, I am still able to put in a word here and there.

I think all the British refineries are at work now, but it is possible that, owing to shortage of supplies, they are not always at full work. They certainly are not, even when at full work, capable of supplying the British consumer with all the refined sugar he consumes. The foreigner, before the war, sent us every year nearly a million tons, and the British refiner supplied the balance, about 700,000 tons—

And so forth.

I will not read the balance of it. This letter is signed by Mr. George Martineau, the great sugar expert, possibly the foremost sugar authority in the world.

The point I desire to make is that the refiners appeared and attempted to frighten the committee into the belief that if this provision were adopted the British people would refine their own sugar. When this letter was presented to the committee showing that the refiners in England were at work on full time; that they were at work just as far as it was possible for them to work with the supply of sugar at hand; that they worked every day they had raw sugar to work upon—when that was exposed to the committee they abandoned the proposition that the British refiners would refine all this sugar and we would lose the business, and they resorted to another subterfuge. They said that Canada was going to refine all the sugar. They immediately proceeded to say that there were a great number of refiners in Canada and that the sugar would go to Canada to be refined and we would lose this trade.

I brought to the committee the report of the Secretary of Agriculture, Bulletin 473, February 12, 1917, and on page 26 I showed from the report that the export of sugar from Canada was nil, as low as 2 pounds in 1914; I believe that is the year.

I investigated the question of the capacity of the refineries in Canada to refine any portion of this sugar needed by the British public. I found there were only six refineries in Canada; that two of the six refineries were located in the far West, one at Vancouver, and that the freight rates between the Pacific coast and the Atlantic, of course, would prevent their shipping any of the sugar refined in that section to England. Besides that insurmountable handicap, the capacity of that plant was only sufficient to supply the local demand of the people in the vicinity of Vancouver.

Another of those western refineries located in Canada was immediately opposite Detroit, and that the sugar output of this factory was used to supply the local community, and that it had no capacity to refine any sugar for exportation.

The other four factories were located on the Atlantic seaboard, but had been unable to refine any sugar beyond the quantity of sugar needed for local consumption.

So the refiners were compelled to abandon that proposition. It was not possible to frighten the Finance Committee with the idea that the suspension of the drawback would drive this refining business across the Canadian line.

Then they adopted another method, that of trying to show that the repeal of the drawback would be injurious to American interests and American commerce. I have here a telegram from one of the refiners. It is dated June 7, 1917, and reads as follows:

Hon. ROBERT F. BROUSSARD,
Washington, D. C.:

Please reconsider your proposition with regard to the drawback duty. Sugar refiners can not work full time for domestic consumption only. The surplus sugar now imported for export after refining would be eliminated and no financial benefit to Government would accrue. Our export trade would be destroyed, as Cuba produces a white sugar acceptable to the Central and South American trade.

That is the same proposition raised by the Senator from Massachusetts in the question that he asked the Senator from Utah. That has been dealt with, and it is shown that the replacement of that sugar by washed sugar from Cuba is not in contemplation, and there is no disposition for that to be done on the part of the British sugar controllers.

Now, Mr. President, who are the people who are benefited by this drawback? One would imagine that a great many commercial interests were involved in the question of the drawback on sugar. Who are the people who are interested in the drawback? They all appear in the petition addressed to the Finance Committee, a copy of which I have in my hand. I shall not read the letter of opposition, but only the names of people who protest against the repeal of this drawback. This protest is signed first by the American Sugar Refining Co., by the W. J. McCahan Sugar Refining Co., by the Colonial Sugar Refining Co., and by the Warner Sugar Refining Co., and this short list includes nine-tenths of every individual who draws a profit out of the drawback. It is practically all of the drawback beneficiaries.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. BROUSSARD. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Can the Senator state how much their drawback amounts to?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Yes, sir, I have it here, and it is a public document. I have the thing all compiled for three years, which I propose to put in the RECORD. Their drawback amounts to a great deal. These few men absorb the overwhelming bulk of the drawback. All of the refiners are not engaged in this exporting trade. This list represents practically every cent of drawback that is taken out of the Treasury.

There are five concerns in the United States asking Congress to maintain this iniquitous provision by which they absorb out of the Treasury $20,000,000 a year and then assess a tax of a cent a pound upon every pound of sugar consumed in this country. They are all upon that paper—those who draw the benefit of it. Every man interested in that proposition came to Washington when I brought this to the attention of the Committee in order to protest against it. This document, I dare say, was written and signed right here in Washington. They represent every man interested, a handful of men, and they are making abnormal profits. They are the only people, and if they are not using this drawback for illicit, unlawful, and illegal purposes, it is the first law enacted in their behalf that they have not abused, and they are perpetually here asking for the enactment of laws in their behalf.

Now, why do I say that? Let me read you the record of some of the men who have signed this document, as I find it in the office of the Attorney General; the men who are asking special favors at the hands of Congress, the men who are asking to be permitted to continue to drain the Treasury and to exploit the American public. Let me read you their record. Here is a letter from the Attorney General under date of February 19, 1916:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 19, 1916.

Hon. ROBERT F. BROUSSARD,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of February 16, 1916, relative to the settlement of the case against the American Sugar Refining Co. at New Orleans, La.

This is the first of the individuals who signed this petition asking for a continuance of this special privilege to exact tribute from the American people.

The amount involved in the suit at New Orleans was about $120,000 and interest. The case was settled for $52,185.99. I am inclosing herewith a statement which was prepared for the press upon settlement of the case.

There is a case pending against the Federal Sugar Refining Co. in the district court at New York City, to recover $119,080.98 for duties and interest thereon. This suit was instituted in November, 1912, and is set for trial on March 6 next.

There has been no other suit against sugar refining companies to recover duties under this administration. There have been, however, numerous other cases instituted from time to time in the past.

An investigation was made in 1907 into certain alleged frauds in the underweighing of sugars imported into the United States by the American Sugar Refining Co. and its predecessor, Messrs. Havemeyer & Elder. The investigation resulted in a suit against the company and a judgment was obtained in the District Court for the Southern District of New York in the sum of $134,411.03 for fraudulent weighing of sugars on the docks of the Havemeyer & Elder refineries in Brooklyn, N. Y., between the years 1901 and 1907. Following the judgment above mentioned, the defendant opened negotiations in April, 1909, and a compromise was effected by which the judgment for $134,411.03 was paid and in addition the sum of $2,000,000, on account of duties fraudulently withheld by it from the Government on account of the underweighing of the sugar.

The foregoing led to another investigation which resulted in Arbuckle Bros.—

The next signers to this petition—paying duties to the amount of $695,573.19, and the National Sugar Refining Co.—

The next signers—paying back duties in the sum of $604,304.37.

Later investigations disclosed that the American Sugar Refining Co. had received drawbacks on exported—on exported sirups, which, in fact, had been manufactured in whole or in part out of free and not dutiable sugars. These claims were settled by payment of $700,000.

Now, mark you, "on exported"—

Those are the people who are asking for this special privilege. They are the people who are now asking for a continuance of this drawback provision which the committee proposes to abolish to tax the American people in sums equivalent to the duty they pay upon the sugar they import into the country. But that is not all. Here is another letter from the Attorney General, March 6, 1916:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., March 6, 1917.

Hon. ROBERT F. BROUSSARD,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Yesterday when you were in my office you requested to be advised as to the terms of the settlement of the case of U. S. v. Federal Sugar Refining Co. and also of the amount claimed in the petition.

In reply, permit me to say that the amount sued for in this case was $119,080.98 and interest.

The terms of settlement are that the company will waive the statute of limitation for the reliquidation of entries and pay the Government $67,173.22, the compromise being effected upon a basis not involving fraud.

In addition to this, a form of notice to be issued to the press was agreed upon, copy of which I am inclosing to you herewith for your information.

Although the parties are in substantial accord, final settlement of the case has not been definitely consummated, but will be, I think, very shortly.

I believe that this answers all of your inquiries, but if there is any additional information you desire, please advise me.

Yours, very truly,

(Signed) T. W. GREGORY,
Attorney General.

In connection with this correspondence I desire to have printed in the RECORD a third letter from the Department of Justice, which reads:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., March 15, 1916.

Hon. ROBERT F. BROUSSARD,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Permit me to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 11th instant, requesting, in view of the statements contained in the clipping from the Journal of Commerce and Commercial Bulletin, that I apprise you of the circumstances leading to the settlement of the case of United States v. Federal Sugar Refining Co.

Inasmuch as the statutory time for reliquidating the entries set out in this case had expired, the Government could not reliquidate same without first establishing that the entries in question were fraudulently made. The allegations of fraud, therefore, constituted an essential part of the Government's case.

Pending the negotiations for the settlement of the case the sugar company made a written offer to settle the case "upon the express condition and agreement that the Government withdraw its claim of fraud, and that upon acceptance of this offer the above-entitled action will be discontinued." It also offered in furtherance of the negotiations to waive "the time limitation for reliquidation of entries."

The Government refused to settle on this basis, but made the counter offer that if the statute of limitation were waived, so that the Government mght collect what was equitably due, whether fraud existed or not, the Government would, without withdrawing the charge of fraud, settle on a basis not involving fraud and discontinue the case, thus excluding from consideration the question of fraud, which was no longer a necessary element of the Government's case. This left the parties in the position where the defendant did not admit nor the Government withdraw the charge of fraud, but both settled independently of the question of fraud. This understanding was expressed in the final agreement for settlement of the case, as follows: "This payment is made upon the express condition and agreement that the compromise is to be effected on a basis not involving fraud, and that upon acceptance of this offer the above-entitled action will be discontinued."

In a letter accompanying the final offer of settlement, the company's counsel state:

"The offer of compromise has been made upon the express understanding and agreement that you will give this and no other statement to the press, and while I, of course, realize that you will not give out any other statement, yet, as a mere matter of business, I am writing to request you not to accept the offer except and unless this and no other statement is given out."

The statement referred to is the one of which I inclosed a copy to you.

To this the department replied:

"The purpose of agreeing upon the form of notice to be given to the press was to prevent the issuance of different or conflicting statements, and it is clearly understood that neither side will give to the press anything more than the statement agreed upon. The Government will, of course, abide by this agreement and will issue no other statement to the press unless a violation of this understanding by the sugar company make it necessary to issue an explanatory statement, which, of course, the Government does not anticipate."

From the above you will observe that the report of the Journal of Commerce and Commercial Bulletin was incorrect, and that if it was given out by the company was in violation of the agreement above referred to.

I believe this fully answers all of your inquiries.

As requested, I am returning the clipping which you inclosed to me.

Yours, truly,

T. W. GREGORY,
Attorney General.

I desire to put this whole correspondence in the RECORD because it shows all the transactions and the spirit in which these same people have been dealing with the Government. I think I can sum up the operations of these refiners who are the sole beneficiaries of the drawback. There are no others who profit by it. The producer of sugar in the United States can not avail himself of this privilege. The island producer of sugar can not avail himself of this privilege. That market is closed to him because he can not compete with a concern that has the privilege of a drawback of 1 cent a pound out of the Treasury upon every pound exported. The Louisiana sugar producer can not avail himself of the foreign markets. And, mind you, all refiners are not engaged in this business, but just a handful of them.

Now, what is the history of these people? The Senator from Utah would make us believe that these gentlemen are so honest that because the law says the drawback was intended to give them an advantage on a foreign market by paying a part of the price out of the Treasury they would relinquish that part of the price; in other words, that when they deal with a man purchasing sugar from Great Britain they say to him that our price on sugar is 8 cents. If you buy from us we will only collect 7 cents from you because the Treasury of the United States will pay us the other cent. That is what the Senator from Utah will have us believe is being done. As a matter of fact, every time these people have had an opportunity they have not failed to take advantage of it. On account of this very law they have been sued for fraud against the Government. At one time we had a system of duty upon sugar that was ad valorem. It was a law enacted by the first Democratic administration after the Civil War. We had to abandon the system of ad valorem duty on sugar because these people falsified their invoices and robbed the Government out of the duty. Then we put the color restriction in the law and they robbed the Government upon the color restriction, until we had to abandon the color restriction. Then we put on a polariscopic test which is still in existence, and they fudged upon that. They fudge upon it now, and I have shown that they fudge upon it as far as the American consumer is concerned.

We put a duty upon the weight of sugar, and they fudged upon the scales, and every time they were sued they went to the Attorney General and turned over a check in flat liquidation. They would not stand trial.

Now, then, we put a drawback in the law and what do they do? The Attorney General tells us that the American Sugar Refining Co., after being caught, paid $700,000 for using sugar for export on which they paid no duty, and stealing money out of the Treasury as though they had paid the duty. These are the people who ask this privilege. These are the people who would like to see the Senate continue to grant them this privilege. They are the people who have been dragged into court under every provision of every law to benefit themselves. The laws to which I refer were laws in the interest of these same people. They were made in order that they might continue their business. They were made in order to encourage the refining interests and made for men favored by the law to the extent of having special laws in their behalf. You would think that men favored by the law to the extent of having special laws in their behalf would at least respect the laws and not evade them. And yet those are the people whom the Senator from Utah would commend to the Senate.

Now, let me tell you what they are doing by virtue of this drawback; and I think this is an iniquity that ought to be investigated at once. Mark you, the sugar upon which they get a drawback is a refined sugar. The British trade, as I showed a while ago, is demanding washed sugar; but the refiner does not want the British consumer to take washed sugar because he does not handle washed sugar. If he gets any washed sugar he does not use it for exportation, for it is domestic and there has been no duty paid on it. If it is foreign sugar, and he refines it, of course he has to pay the duty; but when he ships it, it goes in the shape of a refined sugar and not a washed sugar. There is considerable demand for sugar in Europe. England herself is in the market for more than a million tons of it this year. France is in the market for a considerable amount of sugar. There is nobody to sell that sugar except the American refiners. These Governments must purchase that sugar from the bunch of individuals in whose favor this law was made—the men who abuse a privilege granted them and who make money out of it—and they, in order to conserve the sugar to supply the demand in the United States, are now busy putting a different kind of sugar upon our market. They are advertising an inferior kind of sugar, as I shall show, and are now inducing the American public to use this inferior sugar in order that they may save their refined sugar for their export business.

They do that because if they sell the refined sugar to the American consumer they will get nothing out of the Treasury, but if they sell it to the British or French consumer they get a bonus from the United States Treasury of a cent a pound on it. So what do they do?

They started out some years ago to drive out of the American market the old-fashioned brown sugar which was made on the cane plantation; they drove that sugar out. I shall show how they did it; and I shall show their work in England—how they have undertaken to change the British taste that is now demanding washed sugars instead of refined sugars. Perhaps I had better show how they drove the old plantation brown sugar out of the market before I deal with the sugar which they are now putting on the market and which they fraudulently call the same sugar.

Years ago, when we in Louisiana were making brown sugar and when a clean, wholesome brown sugar was made in the West Indies, the refiners conceived the idea that if they could prejudice the public against brown sugar nobody would buy it and they would then purchase all of that sugar, refine it, and, by getting the handling of it, secure a profit on every pound of sugar that everybody else produced. What did they do? They started a campaign against brown sugar. Here is Willett & Gray's Weekly Statistical Sugar Trade Journal, the accepted sugar magazine of the country, which is reliable in every way. This issue is of date January 22, 1898, and it will serve to illustrate the policy they pursued. They got a chemist to certify that there was a bug in brown sugar. Here is one of the advertisements of the refiners, with a photograph of the bug. They advertised that this sugar had a bug in it which they called in some cases a louse and in other cases they called it a lizard. Here is what they said about that sugar:

WHAT ARE RAW SUGARS?

Prof. Cameron, public analyst of the city of Dublin—

They went over to Dublin to get a chemist to discover this bug—who has examined samples of raw sugar, states that they contained great numbers of disgusting insects, which produce a disgusting disease.

Mark you, they did not say what disease, but that they "produced a disgusting disease."

Their shape is very accurately shown in the accompanying figures, magnified 200 diameters. Figure 1 is the under side and figure 2 is the upper side. His description is as follows:

The Acarus sacchari is a formidably organized, exceedingly lively, and decidedly ugly little animal. From its oval-shaped body stretches forth a proboscis terminating in a kind of scissors, with which it seizes upon its food. Its organs of locomotion consist of eight legs, each jointed and finished at its extremity with a hook.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator's statement that these bugs were in brown sugar leads me to inquire whether the alcohol which is distilled from that kind of sugar is what is called "bug juice"? [Laughter.]

Mr. BROUSSARD. I imagine so, but I am not very well advised about liquor. This description continues:

In the sugar, its movements from one place to another are necessarily very slow, but when placed on a perfectly clean and dry surface, it moves along with great rapidity.

He adds that—

The number of Acari found in raw sugar is sometimes exceedingly great, and in no instance is the article quite free from either the insects or their eggs. Muscovado, as it comes from the colonies, should never be used.

He further says:

The Acari sacchari do not occur in refined sugar of any quality—

That is in great big, bold, black type—because they can not pass through the charcoal filters of the refinery, and because refined sugar does not contain any nitrogeneous substance upon which they could feed.

The advertisement closes with the injunction:

Use only refined sugar.

They proceeded to disgust the American public with good, pure sugar by publishing this horrid picture of an insect and defining that insect through the words of some college professor in Dublin. They kept this advertisement before the public and proceeded to destroy that industry. They induced people, who themselves and whose ancestors for generations before them had been accustomed to use that sugar, to stop using it, and they at one and the same time through this method of publicity forced the producer of that sugar to sell it to them, to be worked over, and the consumer to buy the refined sugar from them. That was the campaign they made not very long ago, for I found this advertisement, which was circulated all through the country at that time, published in 1898.

To-day they want all the refined sugar for the British and French trade; they do not want to sell it to the American consumer. What do we find they are now doing? They spent this year, according to their own statement, over a million dollars advertising sugar. Here [exhibiting] are a lot of advertisements in the Washington newspapers that you can see every day about their sugars. They are busy now advertising a kind of sugar which they call cane sugar—old-fashioned brown—the very sugar they said had these bugs in it; not the very sugar, because that sugar of former years was a pure sugar. Here [exhibiting] is a sample which I secured in Baltimore. This package comes from Texas. I have not opened it, but it can be obtained anywhere in the country. No sugar man can tell me what this conglomerate is. This is the sugar they are palming off on the American public, spending a million dollars advertising it, for which they should be prosecuted. This article which they have denounced as being filled with lice and lizards they are now selling to the American public in order to conserve refined sugar to ship abroad and raid the Public Treasury.

I am not exaggerating this situation. Let me read you of what this sugar consists. I obtained a package of that sugar in Baltimore and brought it to the United States Bureau of Standards, which gauges every pound of sugar upon which a duty is paid in the customhouse. I have here the analysis which was made on the 8th of August just passed and here is the result:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
BUREAU OF STANDARDS,
Washington, August 8, 1917.

Hon. ROBERT F. BROUSSARD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am pleased to inform you that the polarizations of the two samples of sugar submitted by you to-day are as follows:

	First reading.	Second reading.	Accepted average.
B. A. yellow (J. W. Crook)	84.3	84.4	84.35
Domino (old-fashioned brown)	84.08	84.04	84.06

The above values are in degrees sugar.

Respectfully,

S. W. STRATTON, Director.

Mr. President, this sugar is an 84 sugar. Do you fully realize what that means? It means that when a poor devil who is urged to go back to the kind of sugar which his grandfather used to buy—the good old-fashioned brown sugar—buys 100 pounds of that sugar he gets but 84 pounds; he is robbed of 16 pounds. It means that they are foisting this iniquitous stuff as good sugar upon the American public, robbing them of 16 pounds on every 100 pounds they buy in order to conserve the granulated sugar to supply to their British and French customers, and to draw this 1 cent duty out of the Treasury. It means that when a customer in this country who has formerly purchased good Domino, which represents the best grade of refined sugar in the country, buys a box of this new sugar, with the recommendation of the American Sugar Refining Co. upon the box that it is good old-fashioned brown sugar—which, by the by, the American Sugar Refining Co. formerly said when they did not own any of that sugar, was filled with lice—it means that when he has paid a dollar for that sugar he has really got only 84 cents worth of sugar; that for 16 cents of what he pays he receives no return.

Nobody knows how this sugar is made. I invite the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who knows a great deal about sugar, to inspect this sugar and to tell me if he knows how it is gotten together. It has been suggested that it is the scraps and the sweepings of the sugarhouse after they have taken all the good sugar and have run the stuff through the refinery two or three times. They take the sweepings of the sugarhouse—with the dirt and the filth, with the gum and the mud and the sand—they take that stuff and they advertise it under the name of an ostensibly reputable concern that is here praying that Congress permit them to continue this iniquitous thing upon the American public; and, in order to make more profit and get more money out of the Treasury, they are foisting it upon their fellow citizens at this time while they are conserving the good grades of sugar for the double purpose of building up a trade in England and France and for getting money out of the Treasury. Does the Senator from Utah, or any other Senator, defend the course of these men whose cause he pleads when, by maintaining this drawback, these refiners may continue to practice this iniquity in violation of the law?

Now, let me show you just what they are doing with this sugar. For selling this sugar they ought to be prosecuted; they have no business putting it on the market; every hundred pounds of it has 16 pounds of foreign matter. I do not know how many of the bugs to which I have referred are in that sugar, but let me show you what they are doing in England. These same refiners, in order to keep the washed sugar, the clean sugar, to which the Senator from Massachusetts referred, from going on the British market to supply the British demand for that class of sugar, are now busy, showing that good plantation sugar is filled with this same sort of stuff. In demonstration of this I quote from the recent records of Parliament. I read a while ago the statement that they found some of these insects in that sugar. I read again from the International Sugar Journal, of London, the authority and reputation of which will not be questioned. In the issue of July, 1917, at page 294, we find:

IMPURITIES IN RAW SUGAR.

In our last issue we commented on the statements made in Parliament as to the impurity of certain raw sugars imported mainly from Cuba, and expressed the opinion that more sugar was going through the refineries than was necessary. This criticism was to be found also in the daily press and was emphasized by parliamentary speakers. But it has now to be admitted in justice to the refiners that, whatever may be the case as to the purity of some consignments (which we still think might have been allowed to go into direct consumption), there have been too many others coming from Cuba containing a high percentage of physical impurities, which certainly justifies the decision to refine them. Apart from that, the sugars have at times arrived in solid blocks, showing that they had been bagged hot. That dirty bags have been used in some cases appears undeniable on the evidence. And the proportion of physically tainted sugar which has been sent over would appear to have been considerably higher than one would be led to expect from Cuban sugar centrals.

In view of the degree of publicity which Cuban sugars have received of late in the British Parliament, it seems highly desirable that the explanation of the Cuban manufacturers should be forthcoming, if Cuban sugar is not to acquire a bad name amongst British consumers. One point that will need elucidating is as to whether the sugar sent over to this country was so dispatched in the understanding that it was in any event to go to the refineries. For if the manufacturer knew that there was no question of his product being put into direct consumption he might feel justified in ignoring the presence of the physical impurities, having regard to circumstances which may have held at the time. But in view of the fact that the best Cuban crystals are usually pure enough to warrant dispensing with refining, especially when the refining output is not equal to the demand, the recent faulty shipments certainly seem to cast unnecessary reflection in the eyes of the public here as to the quality of the sugar the modern Cuban centrals can turn out, and it would be in the interests of the Cuban manufacturers to clear up the misapprehension, unless, indeed, they are content indefinitely to cater for the refineries, and have no desire to turn out direct consumption sugars.

We need hardly add here that we are not joining issue with those who would eliminate the refiner altogether. Admittedly, the trend of improvement in raw cane sugar factories of late years has been, and will increasingly be in the future, toward the production in the raw sugar central of a product which can be sold for direct consumption. Such sugar will command a higher price than will the lower refining grades; hence the sugar manufacturers will have some inducement to turn out the purest quality they can. But this is not the purity of the refined article, and there will always be a demand for the latter for table use and for preserving, which is not likely to be lessened by a wider acquaintance with the "plantation white" grade. The rôle of the latter will be mainly for cooking, both domestic and trade. The real point of recent criticisms has been a fairly well-founded belief (as we have assumed) that the existing shortage of sugar has been increased by the delay that has arisen through the decision to refine certain raw sugars which were, in the opinion of many, fit under the circumstances to be sent into direct consumption. The proportion may not have been so great as has been alleged, but it does appear to have existed; and in view of the urgent need of sugar for domestic purposes, the complaints in Parliament and elsewhere would seem to have been justified.

Now I desire to refer to questions asked in Parliament with regard to the efforts of the refiners to continue their hold upon the granulated sugar market which they have secured through the war, which has operated to exclude German and Austrian sugar from the British market. Here are reproduced a number of interrogatories to members of the cabinet in the British Parliament. I shall not read the whole of it, but I want to read just one part of the answer of Capt. Bathurst, who is connected with the pure food commission and is a purchaser, as I understand, of sugar for the British Government. He was asked by Sir H. Dalziel with regard to the white sugar that was being imported into England, and he said this—I had better read the question and answer:

Sir H. DALZIEL. Having regard to the fact that the honorable and gallant gentleman the other day made some serious suggestions about the impurities of this sugar, why should he not be able to give up the analysis which was made previously when I asked my question?

To which Capt. Bathurst replied in part—I shall not read the whole of it:

I should like to invite the right honorable gentleman to come and see the collection now to be found in the Sugar Commission Museum. As a zoologist it would interest him.

They had reference to the same bug to which I have referred, the presence of which in certain sugar the refiner was using here to prejudice the consumer. The British consumer is asking for washed sugar, and right away the contention arises that such sugar is bad, while over here the men who formerly urged that that sugar was bad because it contained these objectionable insects are now palming it off upon the American public.

I sent to a gentleman in whom I have the greatest confidence and who is engaged in the sugar business and knows the business very thoroughly an inquiry as to this grade of sugar and he replied in this manner:

AUGUST 7, 1917.

I am sending you two packages of this grade of sugar, which is being sold to the public at 50 cents per 100 pounds over the basis price of standard granulated, and I am attaching one of the regular price lists, showing now this sugar is sold in comparison to the other grades, and to anyone familiar with the sugar grades, it will be apparent at a glance that it should be very profitable indeed to market such low grades at relatively high prices, and also that the purchaser would get very poor value in buying this sugar from a standpoint of purity.

Like all other sugar the test will vary somewhat, dependent upon evaporization of the moisture they contain, but although our laboratory has made tests of quite a number of these packages, they have not been able to discover any that showed a purity in excess of 85 degrees. Our test here shows No. 1 package tested 82 per cent sucrose. No. 2 shows 84.8 per cent.

The refined sugar, that is, standard granulated test 99.9 plus sucrose, therefore the sugar in these two packages would have an actual value in sugar content of about 82 per cent and 85 per cent, respectively, of standard granulated, and as compared with 96 per cent raw sugars, they would be worth approximately 79 per cent and 81 per cent, respectively, and this I believe will give you an approximate value of the comparative worth of these sugars in bulk on prevailing market prices. As you come from a sugar-producing State, I am quite sure you will agree with me when I say that the grade of sugar as old-fashion brown does not to any extent resemble the brown sugar that was formerly made and sold to the trade by the Louisiana mills, or as far as I know, from any other sugar-producing section. In line with this deception, I am glad to hand you a marked copy of The Lamborn Co., report of August 3 touching on the present plan of the American Sugar Refining Co. in advertising their wares, which I think will be interesting to you in this connection.

Another bad feature of this grade of sugar is that on account of its low purity, it is very liable to invert and still further lose its value for the consumer when subjected to extremely hot weather.

Mr. President, this sugar is quoted here, according to A. H. Lamborn Co., at 8.25, while granulated sugar is quoted at 7.80 and fine-granulated sugar at 7.75.

I looked up this morning the quotation in New York on this good, old-fashioned brown sugar, and I find that it is quoted at 8.90, nearly 9 cents a pound for this stuff.

Here is what Willett & Gray's Weekly Statistical Sugar Trade Journal of January 11, 1917, says in regard to this old-fashioned brown sugar:

American Sugar Refining Co.—New brand.—In response to an insistent demand, the American Sugar Refining Co. have produced and now have ready to market Domino Old-Fashioned brown sugar. Size, 1-pound carton, waxed-paper lining; packing, 24 cartons to a container; price, 50 cents a hunded above basis of fine granulated.

Domino Old-Fashioned brown sugar is carefully prepared brown sugar, packed in net weight 1-pound waxed paper lined cartons. It fills a long-felt want in supplying the housewife with a brown sugar of a standard flavor and color, upon which she can place absolute dependence.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. As I understand that, the sugar contains from 82 per cent to 84 or 85 per cent of sugar?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Has it been analyzed to see what the other 16 per cent is?

Mr. BROUSSARD. No, sir; it has not. I sent it to the Bureau of Standards for an analysis of the saccharose contents.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think it would be very interesting to the public if it were analyzed to find out what the other 16 per cent is.

Mr. BROUSSARD. It would be very interesting. In connection with the remarks of the Senator, I desire to read just a short letter which I received this morning with regard to this sugar, because it presents the very question which the Senator raises.

Mr. KIRBY. What was the precentage of the old Louisiana brown sugar?

Mr. BROUSSARD. The old brown sugar before the days of centrifugals, when the molasses was drained out by gravity, ran as high as 95 and 96 per cent. Since the introduction of centrifugals it will average around 98 per cent. Ninety-six per cent is raw sugar; that is the line of demarcation fixed in the tariff law, and yet this old-fashioned brown sugar now being advertised to which I have referred, is only 84 per cent sugar as shown by the Government test. In Louisiana after we make the firsts we make the seconds, by reworking the molasses, and our seconds run up from 89 and 90 per cent and our thirds make a better showing than this stuff. Yet this so-called old-fashioned brown sugar now being placed on the market is only 84 per cent and some of it only 82 per cent sugar. It is being put on the market purely and exclusively for the reason that the drawback on the statute books induces them to sell their refined product in Europe.

Now let me read you this letter, which is in line with the suggestion of the Senator from Washington. It is dated August 4, and is as follows:

AMERICAN CANE GROWERS' ASSOCIATION OF THE UNITED STATES, 925 WOODWARD BUILDING,
Washington, August 4, 1917.

HON. ROBERT F. BROUSSARD,
The United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: In connection with the so-called old-fashioned sugar now being urged upon the public as a substitute for the vast stocks of the refined article that are being shipped abroad in order to drain heavier drawbacks out of the Treasury, it should be made clear that this sugar is not the old-fashioned, open-kettle Louisiana product that so long enjoyed a reputation for sweetness and purity.

During the consideration of the sugar schedule by the Sixty-first Congress, Senator TILLMAN, in deploring the disappearance of our open-kettle output from the market, said: "I want a good brown sugar such as I got when I was a boy, and not have to pay the Sugar Trust 2 cents a pound extra for it." (CONG. REC., 61st Cong., p. 2378.)

Senator Foster explained to the South Carolina Senator that the Refining Trust had practically driven that class of sugar from the market. This, as you know, continues to be the fact, for practically the only purchasers now are large baking and confectionery corporations that contract for a period of years, for the entire output of some of the smaller plantations. It follows then that the brown sugar now being sold is not the high-grade Louisiana article.

For years the seaboard refiners displayed in every issue of their trade publications a loathsome illustration of the Acarus sacchari, more commonly known as the sugar louse. Accompanying this disgusting picture was the statement that while the insect was found in raw sugar, "and was frequently the cause of a disgusting disease," it did not occur in refined sugar of any quality. The advertisement concluded with the announcement in flaring black-face type, "Use only refined sugars."

By reason of the persistent and aggressive advertising and trade practices of the seaboard refiners the people of the United States were educated to reject the open-kettle product and demand a white granulated sugar. To meet this demand the Louisiana interests have for years been producing a pure granulated sugar made direct from sugar cane without the use of bone black or charcoal made from the bones of animals. This sugar, made under the pure-food laws of the United States, meets all the demands of a pure, clean, wholesome food and is the answer of the Louisiana people to the Sugar Trust for driving their former product from the market. This, however, is not open-kettle sugar.

The Louisiana open-kettle output is high in sugar content, and even the second sugars in that State polarize at 89° and higher. On the other hand, the sugars now being sold by various importers and jobbers as "the kind your grandfather used to sweeten his coffee with" polarize as low as 82°, and most of it has been found to analyze below 85°. Some idea of the inferiority of this stuff can be had from the fact that the standard for soft sugars has for years been fixed in the tariff law as 96°. The tariff on 96° sugar from Cuba is slightly in excess of a cent a pound, 1.0048 to be exact. On sugar testing 82° it is 0.7136 of a cent a pound, and on 85°, the highest test in several samples analyzed, it is only 0.776 of a cent a pound. You can, therefore, understand what an enormous profit there is in unloading these sugars on the American consumer.

The unsuspecting poor who seek to protect themselves from the winter's cold are shielded by law from the imposition of shoddy under the guise of wool, and the pure-food legislation has protected the reputation of New Orleans molasses. It is to be regretted that the old-fashioned open-kettle plantation sugar, such as Senator TILLMAN and others fondly remember, have not also been definitely fixed and determined by law.

Very truly, yours,

PAUL J. CHRISTIAN,
For the American Cane Growers' Association.

Now, Mr. President, I think I can summarize; but before doing so, let me call your attention to one fact that probably will be dwelt upon by those who advocate the retention of the drawback in the law:

The profit of the refiner in this country consists of the difference between the price that he pays for raw sugar and the amount that he receives for refined sugar. That is known as the differential. The refiners have contended on numerous occasions, both before the House and before the Senate committees, that there is profit to them if they can get 60 or 65 points between the price of raw sugar and the price at which they sell their refined sugar. Now, I have compiled the difference during all of this year between raws and refined by weeks, so as to show just what that differential has been. I will not read the whole list, but I want to put it in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission will be granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Nominal.

Mr. BROUSSARD. On January 4, 1917, the raws sold for $5.39—that is, the average for the week according to Willett & Gray—and the refined for $6.615, a differential of $1.22½. Then it goes on $1.22½, $1.22½, $1.34, $1.72, $2, $2.06, $2.12; and it goes on until we reach the first week in July, 1917, just after I had requested the insertion in this bill of a provision to suspend the drawback, and right away they jerked down the differential. Immediately we find that it dropped down to $0.83 the first week in July; the second week in July it dropped to $0.83; the third week to $0.84; then $0.82; then $0.96; and then this last week, when we took up the consideration of the bill, it was down to $0.71.

Now, it is not a fact that this differential of $0.71 at this time has any genuine significance in the sugar market, but they put it at $0.71. Why? They know every way for manipulating markets as well as manipulating trade. There is hardly a pound of raw sugar for sale at this time, and there has not been for several months. All the raw sugar that is available is in the control of these refiners now. The harvesting of the Cuban crop has not started. The Hawaiian crop, the Porto Rican crop, and the Louisiana crop are not on the market. They are not ready. The cane is still green. There is no raw sugar on the market. All the raw sugar that is now available belongs to the refiners.

Now, the differential may be fixed in two ways. One is to lift the price of refined; the other is to lower the price of raw. The moment this agitation started, they were afraid that Congress would see that they were making too much profit; that their differential was too great. They did not want to reduce the price of refined; in fact, they lifted it during that period; so what did they do? There was no raw sugar for sale. They were not going to buy any raw sugar, so they just boosted the price of raw, and made the differential $0.71. They could just as well have made it 1 cent or nothing. It would not have affected the trade in any way, but it shows the method they pursue.

I am calling the attention of the Senate to these facts so that we may realize that when they are back of a proposition, as they are behind this proposition, and when they are the only beneficiaries of that proposition, and when they are here urging this proposition, it is not strange that everybody who knows of their methods of doing business is suspicious, and begins to investigate.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] stated the other day that if this suspension were permitted to remain in the law, the effect of it would be to increase the price of Louisiana sugar by one-half a cent a pound; and then the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] asked the Senator whether that would not have the same effect as to the beet sugar of his section, and he modestly admitted that it would; but then he patriotically declared right away that he did not want his people to make that half cent additional. In other words, the Senator said: "If you will suspend this drawback the effect will be to raise the price of sugar to the American consumer by half a cent, and that half a cent will go to the Louisiana planter and the beet grower."

I wonder if the Senator is deceiving himself about that, or whether he is simply taking the statement made in the letter of these refiners to the committee, in which they contend for that, I think, in their seventh proposition? That is not true. The suspending the drawback will tend to reduce the price of sugar to the consumer.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] had the right idea when he asked the Senator from Utah, in the same speech, if the effect which the Senator predicted was had if no refined sugar was exported—whether that would not increase the American supply, and therefore cheapen sugar to the American consumer? The Senator from Ohio was correct. It would cheapen the price, but the Senator from Utah, in face of the well-known economic law of the effect of increasing the supply, contended that it would raise the price. Now, let us see. Let us look into that for a moment.

The price at which the Senator's constituents sell their beet sugar upon the American market is a few points short of the price at which the refiners sell their refined sugar on the same market. They have to cut under that price, always. The people in Colorado must sell their beet sugar to the trade just below the price at which the American cane refiner sells it. Now, then, if it is true, as contended for by the Senator, that the suspension of the drawback will increase the price of sugar half a cent to the beet producers in the West and the cane-sugar producers in Louisiana, of course it will also increase the price of sugar for the refiners. If the suspension of the drawback is to permit the cane-sugar people in Louisiana and the beet-sugar people in the West to get half a cent more for their sugar than they are now receiving, then the competing concerns, the American Sugar Trust, will also be enabled to increase prices. Is not that inevitable? The argument of the Senator from Utah is tantamount to saying that if you take away from the refiner the 1 cent on every pound which he draws out of the Treasury you will have added to the value of that pound a half cent; in other words, that if you deduct a cent from a pound of sugar in the hands of the refiner by withholding the drawback, then by that operation you have increased the value of that pound by a half cent. Does anyone believe that? Is it possible to accomplish that?

The price of beet sugar will not increase with the suspension of the drawback. It will decrease. How much more true this is of Louisiana sugar, when we know that that sugar is sold to the trust itself.

The truth of the matter is—and the Senator from Utah knows it—that the withholding of the drawback means increasing the supply for domestic consumption and the general depression of the price of sugar upon the American market.

The Senator should know that the Louisiana sugar planters are not in favor of this drawback proposition that I have urged. They know that they will lose by the operation. The Senator should know that the beet-sugar people are not in favor of this proposition; that they are pulling with the trust at this time to maintain the drawback. The Senator should know that the Hawaiian producers are in accord with the trust and are not in favor of this proposition. Does the Senator mean to tell an intelligent Senate that the Hawaiian producer, the beet-sugar producer, and the Louisiana planter are opposed to the drawback being suspended because, by being suspended, it is going to add to the value of the crop which they are growing this year; or does he not know—indeed, he must know—that they are opposed to it because they know that the effect of it will be to cheapen the cost of sugar to the American consumer?

You can pass 20 of your food-control bills, and appoint 40 of your Hoovers to administer them, and they will not have so beneficent an effect upon the price of sugar as will this provision of the law. If you suspend it, you stop a raid upon the Treasury. If you suspend it, you cut the price of sugar to every man, woman, and child in this land. The Senator's opposition to it, so far as I am able to judge the opposition, is predicated upon the same reasons that the trust urged. He knows that taking away the drawback will reduce the price of the crop that is being grown in the West, and it is not because he does not want this additional half cent; it is because he fears and he knows that it will possibly reduce his price by one cent.

What I have been trying to do, earnestly and honestly, is to impress upon the Finance Committee and to impress now upon the Senate that if we are to receive any relief from the machinations of these combinations that control the sugar output of this country and now control the sugar markets of the world, if we are to get away from them at all, we must withdraw from them those props by which they lift up the price to everybody.

I had not expected to speak nearly as long as I have spoken. I was interrupted several times by questions which I welcomed; but I want to insert in the RECORD some tables with regard to the differentials for the years 1910 to 1916, showing what these differentials have been.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Average price per pound.

	Raw.	Refined.	Difference.
1916	5.786	6.862	1.076
1915	4.642	5.559	.917
1914	3.814	4.683	.869
1913	3.506	4.278	.772
1912	4.162	5.041	.879
1911	4.453	5.345	.892

Mr. BROUSSARD. Now, Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate longer; but when this question comes up, when, as the Senator from Utah says, an amendment will be offered to strike this provision out of the bill, I shall hold myself in readiness, even at the expense of inflicting myself upon the Senate at a time when possibly we should be traveling with greater speed with regard to this bill, to protest against the continuance of the system which at one and the same time permits a handful of men located in a little spot on the Atlantic seaboard to dominate absolutely the sugar market of the world.

Sugar is a necessity. It enters into the life of everybody. Human beings can not exist without it. It is one of the essentials of life; and it should not be entrusted to the few men who have signed this document, and who are here asking for the privilege of plucking the entire world. Long enough have they plucked the people who produce raw sugar. Long enough have they plucked those who have dealt with them. At this time we should not permit the continuation of a system by which they draw money from the Treasury of the United States without having earned it, and then inflict their methods upon our allies in Europe and upon every person in this country who uses sugar.

Mr. President, I have here several tables that I should like to include in my remarks, and I ask unanimous consent to do so. They have all been referred to, but I want to include them as a whole; and I ask unanimous consent for their insertion in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 28, 1917.

Hon. ROBERT F. BROUSSARD,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The department refers to your letter of the 15th instant requesting a statement of the drawback on sugar from June 30, 1916, up to the present time.

As stated in the department's letter of the 18th instant, the amounts reported by this department on July 26, 1916, covered the actual payments up to January 1, 1916, and an estimate after that date up to June 30.

There is inclosed herewith a tabulation showing the amounts of the drawbacks paid on sugar and sirup and sugar in manufactured articles from January 1, 1916, to June 18, 1917.

Very truly, yours,

L. F. ROWE, Assistant Secretary.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am not going at this time to attempt to go into a detailed answer to the statements made by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD]. I want to assure him, however, that many of the statements that have been made by him, construing what I said to the Senate the other day, can not be substantiated in any way.

I hold no brief for the sugar refiners. I do not care for them any more than I do for any other business in the United States, and not so much, for if any body of men has undertaken to destroy the production of sugar in this country it has been the sugar refiners. But, Mr. President, I am enough of an American to believe that it is my duty as a Senator of the United States to see that business from any quarter of the world that can be brought to the United States shall so be, and the reason why I am opposed to the drawback provision of the present law is that if it is repealed it is going to drive from this country a great deal of business that otherwise would come here.

Mr. President, the Senator says that I know that by the repeal of this drawback provision sugar will be reduced in price 1 cent a pound. Why, Mr. President, the Senator does not know any such thing, but I do know, and so does the Senator from Louisiana know, that since this bill has been reported to the Senate repealing the drawback provision the world's price of sugar has advanced over 50 cents a hundred.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I will yield to the Senator, although the Senator would not yield to me. I will grant the courtesy to him at any time, however. I will yield to any Senator.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I want to ask the Senator whether he means to convey the idea that the refiners are opposing the repeal of the drawback because the effect of it is to raise the price of sugar?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, the Senator must know that I did not even intimate such a thing.

Mr. BROUSSARD. But the Senator asserts that the reason for the increase in the price of sugar recently is because there was a provision in this bill to repeal the drawback. Does not the Senator know that every refiner in the country is here busy trying to save himself from the repeal of this law, and that the refiners are not doing that because it helps them to lift the price, but they are doing it because they know that they will have to disgorge part of the unearned profits which they take from the public?

Mr. SMOOT. It is not going to help the refiners to pass legislation that will advance the world's price of sugar. The refiners are opposed to the repeal, because it will prevent sugar from being refined in this country for exportation. They want to buy the sugar in the world's market as cheaply as possible, as all of the sugar refined for exportation they have to buy in the world's market. I do not know what the Senator had in mind when he asks such a question, but I do know that since this bill has been reported to the Senate repealing the drawback provision the world's price of sugar has increased over half a cent a pound.

The Senator has tried to lead the Senate to believe that the English Government pays the refiners the tariff duty collected on sugars and later returned to the refiners when exported. Such is not the case, and I can prove it by daily quotations. Does the Senator know that the English ambassador has protested against the repeal of the drawback law? Does the Senator know that England has purchased Cuban sugars, and they have been refined in the United States under a contract of $1.15 a hundred? All that the refiners had to do with such sugar was to refine it in transit, and receive for its refining $1.15 a hundred for so doing. If it made no difference, would the English ambassador be protesting against it? Would our allies be opposed to the repeal?

No, Mr. President; I want to say now that the Senator knows that if this provision prevails our allies will either have to get their sugar refined in Canada or in their own country, or if compelled to have it refined in the United States for lack of refining facilities it is going to cost them a cent and a half per pound more than under present law. The Senator should know that because of the fact that there was 700,000 tons of sugar refined in this country for England and France last year the cost of refining sugar has been reduced in this country, and the American consumer has received that much benefit.

Why, Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana thinks that if we can keep out of this country the refining of a million tons of sugar for our allies this year such action will advance the price of Louisiana sugar as the world's price of sugar will advance, and as it advances so will the price advance on Louisiana sugar. So will the price advance for beet sugar, in which my State is greatly interested; but I protest against our taking advantage of the allies at this time, when sugar is so high, by making them pay a cent and a half a pound more for what they may be compelled to have refined in this country on account of the war.

Why, Mr. President, a cent and a half a pound on sugar refined for exportation last year to our allies would mean an amount of money that would erect enough refineries to refine all the sugar that our allies would require. Oh, yes; only a small percentage of the amount would build refineries enough. Congress is now asked to place a burden upon our allies, because we can catch them between the door and we can squeeze it out of them.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Why, certainly.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Does the Senator adopt the same policy with regard to the excise tax which he places upon this same sugar charged to the British Government? Why did he not exempt that from the operation of it if he is so insistent that the drawback should be exempted? It was in his power. He is on the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that is exactly what I would have done if I could have had my way. If the drawback provision is repealed, then England will have to pay the half cent consumption tax imposed on sugar in this bill; and not only that, but she will have to pay the extremely high consumption tax that is imposed upon sugar by England.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Let me state to the Senator from Utah that I am not so much concerned about the British ambassador. I am concerned about the American consumer, the man who eats sugar, who is my compatriot.

Mr. SMOOT. And so am I.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I will state to the Senator that I am not asking that the British people be discriminated against. I am asking to quit discriminating in favor of the British public and against the American public. I want the Senator to defend himself on that proposition and not to drag in the British ambassador as his authority, as though that frightens an American citizen on the floor of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. Why, it is so simple that I wonder why the Senator would suggest such a thing. The American consumer, Mr. President, is not going to be benefited by the repeal of the drawback provision. The American consumer will have to pay the tariff tax of 1 cent a pound and the American consumer will have to pay the half cent consumption tax, whether the drawback is repealed or not. Not only that; I am interested in the American consumer enough to say that the repeal will advance the world price of sugar, and by so doing it will advance the price of all the sugar that is produced or consumed in this country; and I am interested in all the consumers of sugar in this country and not in the growers of sugar cane only or the producers of beet sugar.

The Senator tried to make it appear that the sugar refiners were levying tribute upon beet sugar by saying that it was always sold at less than cane sugar. Such is the case in all the world. Beet sugar always has been 10 cents a hundred less than the market price of cane sugar. It is not the sugar refineries that make that difference in price, Mr. President. Of course they approve of it. There is just as much saccharine in beet sugar; it is just as pure as the cane sugar; but it is claimed that in preserving fruits beet sugar is not quite as good. Candy manufacturers claim that it is not quite as good for candy making; and for these reasons this differential of 10 cents a hundred has been adopted.

Mr. President, it would not make any difference to me if every beet grower or if every beet-sugar producer in the United States should appeal to me and ask me to support the repeal of the drawback provision; I would not do it, because it is unjust to the business of the United States; and I want to say that not one single beet-sugar producer in the United States has protested to me on the position I have taken, and they all know my position.

Mr. President, I want to do everything I can to encourage business in the United States; I do not care in what part of the country it may be located; and the Senator ought to know that if I could assist the sugar planters of his State I would do so. No Senator in this body has plead for them more than I. Does he think that I would do anything to hurt them? No; never; rather would I go out of public life. I would not let the hatred against the refiners of this country, as manifested by the speech just delivered by the Senator from Louisiana, stand in the way of my doing justice to that line of business.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HOLLIS. I should like to ask the Senator if, in case the majority report is adopted and the provisions recommended by the majority become a law, there will be any substantial amount of sugar exported from this country that will pay the one-half cent a pound excise tax?

Mr. SMOOT. There would not be a pound, if it could be secured anywhere else in the world.

Mr. HOLLIS. This country does not produce as much sugar as it uses?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, not nearly. Why, Mr. President, we produce just a little more than half what we consume, and we import the balance from Cuba.

We import Cuban sugar because we have our 20 per cent differential in the tariff rate. The Senator spent a good deal of time in his speech in showing a little pound package of brown sugar. Suppose we had granulated sugar put up in 1-pound packages, does the Senator think it would be quoted at the same price it is quoted to-day on the market? He knows it would not. To put up sugar in 1-pound boxes cost money. Eighty-four per cent sugar——

Mr. BROUSSARD. Does the Senator pretend to defend the policy by which the American Sugar Refinery Co. is foisting upon the American public 84-purity sugar as high-grade sugar, and telling the people who use it that it is good, old brown plantation sugar? Does the Senator, as a business man and as an honest man, justify that course of conduct on the part of anybody—to impose on the public and pretend to sell 100 pounds of sugar when selling only 84 pounds, and collecting a dollar and giving in return only 82 cents? Does the Senator propose to defend that sort of outrageous conduct which would land a man in the penitentiary rather than class him as a business man?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator does not remember that we have a pure-food law. He has forgotten altogether that no producer in this country can sell adulterated food or drugs of any kind unless in violation of the law, and generally there is plainly marked on the container what it contains.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Show me the marking.

Mr. SMOOT. Wait until I get through. I want to answer one question at least before I yield for another.

Mr. President, the Senator wants to make the Senate believe that there is 84 per cent saccharine in sugar and 16 per cent of floor sweepings, consisting of mud and sand and all the dirty ingredients that are used around a sugar refinery. The Senator knows just as well as he knows anything that sugar containing but 84 per cent saccharine, even if made in Louisiana, would be so dark that they could not sell it in any market unless bleached.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Does the Senator contest the analysis made by the Bureau of Standards of the United States Government?

Mr. SMOOT. No; and if the Senator will just have a little patience I will further explain.

I say to the Senate that if the sugar submitted contains but 84 per cent saccharine it has been bleached, and if it contains 16 per cent of mud and all sorts of dirty ingredients no bleaching on earth could give it the color it has.

The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] asked what the 16 per cent contents were. The 16 per cent is molasses, and that is what our grandfathers used to sweeten their coffee with—pure molasses—but to make it the color that it is it has passed through a bleaching process.

I do not say to the Senator that it ought to be put up in this way or that it ought to be misrepresented or that it ought to be called grandfather sugar. I do not care what they call it. I know that there are certain pastries made where it is an advantage to use brown sugar, and on several occasions in Washington Mrs. Smoot has asked me to purchase for the house 4 or 5 pounds of brown sugar. The quantity of brown sugar that will be sold in this country is so infinitesimally small that it will amount next to nothing, and if the refiners have spent a million dollars in advertising it I think it is a mighty poor business proposition.

Mr. President, the Senator having the bill in charge I know wants to proceed with its consideration, and therefore I am not going at this time to answer the other points the Senator from Louisiana has discussed; but, as he said, when the amendment is before the Senate we shall then have plenty of time to discuss it, and every point of it will be discussed. Then I shall be very, very content with what the Senate agrees upon.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, before we take up the bill for the further consideration of amendments I wish to present a resolution by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 117), as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ an additional clerk, at the rate of $120 per month, for a period lasting from August 20, 1917, until the end of the present session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, to be paid out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to state that a resolution was passed about three months ago authorizing an additional clerk for two months. That time has been out for about a month. I find that the force of the Finance Committee is absolutely unable to cope with its work, and I should like to have this additional clerk until the end of the session. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the statute requires that the resolution must go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is correct. Let it be referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. We will report it out to-morrow.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask that the Secretary resume the reading of the bill for amendments, beginning with page 24, Title III, War tax on beverages. There are certain amendments which were passed over at the request of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]. He stated that he wished them to go over for one day. They have now gone over for two days, and I hope that we may consider those amendments now.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the Senate adopted a resolution providing for the printing of 65,000 copies of the majority report. That number of copies can be printed within the limitation of the appropriation which enables either House to print upon a resolution passed by the House or the Senate alone. A like resolution was adopted for the printing of the minority report at the same time that the resolution was adopted for printing the majority report, but owing to the fact that there are a large number of tables in the minority report, tables which I think Senators will find useful, the $500 limitation for printing will be exceeded if more than 20,000 copies are printed. I therefore ask unanimous consent to present at this time for adoption another resolution for printing 20,000 additional copies of the minority report. That is as many copies as can be printed under one resolution.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I was sure the Senator from North Carolina would have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 118) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed 20,000 additional copies of Senate Report No. 103, part 2, Sixty-fifth Congress, first session, entitled "Revenue to defray war expenses," of which 5,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 15,000 for the use of the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will resume the reading of the bill.

The SECRETARY. At the top of page 24, Title III—War tax on beverages, section 300——

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, there are quite a number of Senators who are opposed to increasing the tax on liquors. I am going to take just a moment or two to explain my position and then permit these matters to come to a vote.

The tax on various kinds of liquors is increased by the bill. I do not criticize the committee for this action. Revenue is sought and is needed, and it has been the policy of the Government for many years to raise revenues by such taxes. This policy has given the liquor interests their strongest weapon with which to fight prohibition, and the temperance forces of the country realize that such revenue taxes as may be imposed by this bill will make the fight for temperance all the harder.

I want to put in the RECORD what I believe to be the attitude of the temperance forces of this country on this subject. In so far as the taxes imposed by this bill are prohibitive they favor them, but they are opposed to any increase for revenue purposes. They would, in fact, rejoice to see all revenue taxes taken off liquors. They believe the time has come for the Nation to divorce itself from this traffic. No partnership should be continued with an interest that is outlawed by public opinion generally and by legislative enactment in a majority of the States of the Union. We can not afford as a people or as a nation to measure the lives and homes destroyed, the suffering and poverty produced, and the crimes fostered by this traffic by the revenue raised from it.

The official representatives of 22 great organizations promoting national prohibition declared a short time ago that they are "opposed to all tax on liquors except prohibitive taxes," and several great church organizations pledged their membership to purchase annually during the war five hundred millions of bonds, if necessary, to take the place of revenues lost through prohibition or the repeal of liquor taxes.

I want to read an extract from a letter by C. J. Meddis, the executive secretary of the Men's Federation of Louisville, Ky.:

We believe that the majority of the right-thinking people in this country are in favor of abolishing all tax on liquors except such as are really prohibitive.

We believe that if the question is put up to the people of this country that they will readily undertake to raise the revenue that is now collected from the liquor business, as the decrease in our taxes which are now necessary to support court officials, jails, workhouses, hospitals, insane asylums, etc., would in a few years compensate for what is now collected in revenue from the liquor business.

I have here a statement prepared by the National Temperance Society giving statements made by several prominent persons, which I ask that I may insert as a part of my remarks without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement referred to is as follows:

Queen of Madagascar: "I can not consent, as your queen, to take revenue from that which destroys the souls and bodies of my subjects."

Canon Wilberforce: "The deriving of vast sums for the revenue from the bitter suffering and grinding pauperism of the people is a terrible offense."

Horace Greeley: "To sell rum for a livelihood is bad enough, but for a whole community to share the responsibility and guilt of such a traffic seems a worse bargain than that of Eve or Judas."

Gerritt Smith: "If the traffic in ardent spirits is immoral, then of necessity are the laws which authorize the traffic immoral. And if the laws are immoral, then we must be immoral if we do not protest against them."

Justice Greer, United States Supreme Court: "And if a loss of revenue should accrue to the United States from a diminished consumption of ardent spirits she will be a gainer of a thousandfold in the health, wealth, and happiness of the people."

Emperor of China: "It is true, I can not prevent the introduction of the flowing poison; gain-seeking and corrupt men will, for profit and sensuality, defeat my wishes, but nothing will induce me to derive a revenue from the vice and misery of my people."

Gladstone, to the brewers of London: "Gentlemen, I can not permit a question of mere revenue to be considered alongside of a question of morals; but give me a sober population, not wasting their earnings on strong drink, and I will know where to get my revenue."

Lord Chesterfield: "Luxury, my Lords, is to be taxed, but vice prohibited; let the difficulty in the law be what it will, would you lay a tax upon a breach of the Ten Commandments? Government should not, for revenue, mortgage the morals and health of the people."

State Board of Charities of Pennsylvania, 1871: "Should these wages of iniquity be put into the Treasury? They are the price of blood, and in their aggregate would be inadequate to buy fields enough to bury the multitudes who are the victims of the dreadful traffic for whose profits they sell the people's sanction."

Sir Stafford Northcote, chancellor of the exchequer: "If the revenue diminished from increased habits of temperance the amount of wealth such a change would bring to the nation would utterly throw into the shade the amount of revenue that is now derived from the spirit duty, and we should not only see with satisfaction a diminution of the revenue from such a cause, but we should find in various ways that the exchequer would not suffer from the losses which it might sustain in that direction."

Mr. JONES of Washington. This increase is the one tax in this bill welcomed by those upon whom it is levied. The liquor people will not pay it out of their pockets. They will take it from the pockets of their customers, and so long as it is not prohibitive they do not object. Labor pays much of it out of its wages. It is, in fact, a tax burden upon those least able to bear it, and it is more oppressive in its effects than all the other taxes in this bill combined.

The brewers and distillers welcome this tax. In fact, they sought it. In a letter dated May 2, 1917, sent out by the Distillers' Security Corporation they said: "We are in favor of increasing—during the period that the present war continues—a tax from $1.10 to $2.20 per proof gallon." They welcome this increase, because they believe it will help them in their fight against prohibition. They look upon it as an intrenchment tax. Against the lives and homes destroyed, against the suffering and poverty produced, against the jails, almshouses, and asylums filled, against crimes and murders fostered by their traffic, they will place the revenues paid to the Government and ask to be allowed to continue their destructive work.

Mr. President, it is against this that the temperance people of the Nation protest. They insist that their Government ought not and must not heed such a plea and that to do so is to abdicate the highest and best function of government. We want the RECORD to show that the temperance forces are not only not urging this tax increase, but that they are opposed to it, and they will insist hereafter that the liquor interests are entitled to no consideration whatever because of any taxes paid by them.

Now, Mr. President, I am ready for the Senate to vote on these amendments, but I just wish to say I do not want the President to put the question on the amendments as having been agreed to without objection, but to put it to a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first two amendments of the committee on page 24 have been agreed to. The Secretary will begin, in line 8, and state the amendment.

The next amendment was, in line 8, after "$1.10," to insert "(or, if withdrawn for beverage purposes, a tax of $2.10)," and in line 12, after the word "distiller," to strike out "and imposed" and insert "or importer when withdrawn," so as to make the clause read:

That on and after the enactment of this act there shall be levied and collected on all distilled spirits in bond at that time or that have been or that may be then or thereafter produced in or imported into the United States, except such distilled spirits as are subject to the tax provided in section 304, in addition to the tax now imposed by law, a tax of $1.10 (or, if withdrawn for beverage purposes, a tax of $2.10) on each proof gallon, or wine gallon when below proof, and a proportionate tax at a like rate on all fractional parts of such proof or wine gallon, to be paid by the distiller or importer when withdrawn, and collected under the provisions of existing law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, after line 14, to insert:

That in addition to the tax under existing law there shall be levied and collected upon all perfumes hereafter imported into the United States containing distilled spirits a tax of $1.10 per wine gallon, and a proportionate tax at a like rate on all fractional parts of such wine gallon. Such tax shall be collected by the collector of customs and deposited as internal-revenue collections, under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, after line 23, to insert:

SEC. 301. That in addition to the tax imposed on distilled spirits by existing law and under section 300, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid on the materials used in the production of such spirits after the enactment of this act the following taxes: On all grains, cereals, and other solid products and materials a tax of $60 per 100 pounds, and on all molasses, sirups, and other liquid fermentable products and materials a tax of $5 per wine gallon. Every distiller using any such materials shall keep such records and file such returns and bonds, and the tax shall be paid at such times and in such manner, and subject to such credits, as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe or require. Under such rules, regulations, and bonds as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe, the provisions of this section shall not apply to materials used in the production of distilled spirits withdrawn exclusively for other than beverage purposes or for the fortification of pure sweet wines as defined by the act entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," approved September 8, 1916; but such spirits shall not be withdrawn for export except upon the application of an accredited representative of a nation at war with the Imperial German Government, or of any neutral nation, in which application it is declared that such spirits are withdrawn for other than beverage purposes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to propose an amendment, to which I think the chairman of the committee will have no objection. In line 20, I move to strike out the word "such" and insert the word "distilled," so as to read "but distilled spirits shall not be withdrawn," and so forth.

Mr. SIMMONS. I accept that amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. In connection with the amendment just agreed to, I have prepared a statement which I ask may be put in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement referred to is as follows:

Here are some representative facts about the shipments of rum from Boston to Africa:

The Boston Herald in April, 1916, reported:

"For transporting rum from Boston to the west coast of Africa $40,000 will be received by the owners of the four-masted schooner Fred W. Thurlow, which has just completed loading at the Charles River stores. The Thurlow will carry more than 200,000 gallons for the natives. She is the twelfth ship from the port with a rum cargo in a year. The increase in the demand for Boston rum is said to be due to the stoppage of shipment from England. Another ship will leave here with another cargo as soon as a sailing vessel can be procured."

The Missionary Herald, October, 1915, said:

"Following last month's statement concerning the shipping of rum to Portuguese West Africa, we take from a Boston daily this report of the continuance of the traffic: 'Laden with the fourth cargo of rum, tobacco, lumber, and flour that has been shipped from Boston within the past few months, the four-masted schooner Florence T. Thurlow sailed to-day for ports on the west coast of Africa. Her shipments included 830 puncheons, 1,770 kegs, and 392 barrels of rum, 2,099 barrels of flour, and 290 tierces and 1,018 cases of leaf tobacco, and quantities of pine boards. The bark Ruth Stark, which recently arrived from Liverpool, will sail with a similar cargo in about two weeks.' The business seems to be growing. Before we throw any more stones at England for her forcing of opium on China, we may reflect what the United States is doing by fortnightly shipments of rum to Africa."

In another issue of the Missionary Herald, after recording the sailing of yet other schooners laden with rum, which the longshoremen are warned not to drink lest they die in short order, the editor remarks: "At each port where it is distributed it will be like the letting loose of hell upon the susceptible and unprotected natives."

The Continent of June 26, 1916, says:

"Exports of spirits from America to Africa, shipped to meet the cutting off of British shipments because of the war, increased from 1,663,000 gallons for the year ending June 30, 1915, to 5,850,000 for the nine months ending March, 1916."

The Pittsburgh Christian Advocate of May 4, 1916, says:

"A steamer sailing from Boston a few days ago for the gold coast of Africa carried in her cargo, among other things, 7,000,000 drinks of rum. Thus the American liquor interests break down what American missionaries build up."

Dr. C. H. Patton, of the American Board, said of rum in a letter dated September 30, 1915: "It is without question the greatest foe we fight in West Africa. Not hethenism, but liquor, is our greatest obstacle."

We may well recall the words of Livingstone as to this supreme curse of Africa, which is also the supreme shame of Europe and America: "May Heaven's richest blessings come upon everyone—English, American, or Turk—who shall help to heal this open sore of the world."

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 26, to insert:

SEC. 302. That no distilled spirits produced after the enactment of this act shall be imported into the United States from any foreign country, or from the West Indian Islands recently acquired from Denmark (unless produced from products the growth of such islands), or from Porto Rico, or the Philippine Islands. Under such rules, regulations, and bonds as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, the provisions of this section shall not apply to distilled spirits imported for other than beverage purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, after line 9, to insert:

SEC. 303. That at registered distilleries producing alcohol or other high-proof spirits packages may be filled with such spirits reduced to not less than 100 proof from the receiving cisterns and tax paid without being entered into bonded warehouse. Such spirits may also be transferred from the receiving cisterns at such distilleries, by means of pipe lines, direct to storage tanks in the bonded warehouse and may be warehoused in such storage tanks. Such spirits may be also transferred in tanks or tank cars to general bonded warehouses for storage therein, either in storage tanks in such warehouses or in the tanks in which they were transferred. Such spirits may also be transferred after tax payment from receiving cisterns or warehouse storage tanks to tanks or tank cars and may be transported in such tanks or tank cars to the premises of rectifiers of spirits. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is hereby empowered to prescribe all necessary regulations relating to the drawing off, transferring, gauging, storing, and transporting of such spirits; the records to be kept and returns to be made; the size and kind of packages and tanks to be used; the marking, branding, numbering, and stamping of such packages and tanks; the kinds of stamps, if any, to be used; and the time and manner of paying the tax; the kind of bond and the penal sum of same. The tax prescribed by law must be paid before such spirits are removed from the distillery premises, or from general bonded warehouse in the case of spirits transferred thereto, except as otherwise provided by law.

Under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe, distilled spirits may hereafter be drawn from receiving cisterns and deposited in distillery warehouses without having affixed to the packages containing the same distillery warehouse stamps, and such packages, when so deposited in warehouse, may be withdrawn therefrom on the original gauge where the same have remained in such warehouse for a period not exceeding 30 days from the date of deposit.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, line 23, to change the number of the section from 301 to 304; on page 28, line 1, after the words "act is," to strike out "passed" and insert "enacted"; in line 4, after the word "and," to insert "which"; in line 5, after "$1.10," to insert "(or, if intended for sale for beverage purposes, a tax of $2.10)"; in line 7, after the word "gallon," to strike out "or wine gallon when below proof"; in line 8, after the word "proof," to strike out "or wine"; in line 11, after the word "proceedings," to strike out "at the time of the passage of this act" and insert "on June 1, 1917"; in line 14, after the word "such," to strike out "delivery" and insert "delivery, to the extent that the amount thus delivered exceeds the 50 gallons hereinbefore provided," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 304. That upon all distilled spirits produced in or imported into the United States upon which the tax now imposed by law has been paid, and which, on the day this act is enacted, are held by a retailer in a quantity in excess of 50 gallons in the aggregate, or by any other person, corporation, partnership, or association in any quantity, and which are intended for sale, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a tax of $1.10 (or, if intended for sale for beverage purposes, a tax of $2.10) on each proof gallon, and a proportionate tax at a like rate on all fractional parts of such proof gallon: Provided, That the tax on such distilled spirits in the custody of a court of bankruptcy in insolvency proceedings on June 1, 1917, shall be paid by the person to whom the court delivers such distilled spirits at the time of such delivery, to the extent that the amount thus delivered exceeds the 50 gallons hereinbefore provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, line 16, to change the number of the section from 302 to 305; in line 19, before the word "gallon," to strike out "wine" and insert "proof"; in line 20, before the word "gallon," to strike out "wine" and insert "proof"; on page 29, in line 12, after the words "act is," to strike out "passed" and insert "enacted: Provided, That this tax shall not apply to gin produced by the redistillation of a pure spirit over juniper berries and other aromatics," so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 305. That in addition to the tax now imposed or imposed by this act on distilled spirits there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a tax of 15 cents on each proof gallon and a proportionate tax at a like rate on all fractional parts of such proof gallon on all distilled spirits or wine hereafter rectified, purified, or refined in such manner, and on all mixtures hereafter produced in such manner, that the person so rectifying, purifying, refining, or mixing the same is a rectifier within the meaning of section 3244, Revised Statutes, as amended, and on all such articles in the possession of the rectifier on the day this act is enacted: Provided, That this tax shall not apply to gin produced by the redistillation of a pure spirit over juniper berries and other aromatics.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 30, line 20, after the words "less than," to strike out "$500 and" and insert "$250 and not more than $1,000 or," so as to make the clause read:

Any person violating any of the provisions of this section shall be deemed to be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction shall be fined not less than $250 and not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than two years. He shall, in addition, be liable to double the tax evaded, the same to be recovered, together with the tax, on any bond given by him as rectifier.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 32, line 5, to change the number of the section from "303" to "308"; in the same line, after the words "after the," to strike out "passage" and insert "enactment"; and in line 12, after the words "tax of," to strike out "$1.25" and insert "$1.50," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 308. That on and after the enactment of this act there shall be levied and collected on all beer, lager beer, ale, porter, and other similar fermented liquor, containing one-half per cent or more of alcohol, brewed or manufactured and sold, or stored in warehouse, or removed for consumption or sale, within the United States, by whatever name such liquors may be called, in addition to the tax now imposed by law, a tax of $1.50 for every barrel containing not more than 31 gallons, and at a like rate for any other quantity or for the fractional parts of a barrel authorized and defined by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 34, after line 7, to insert:

SEC. 310. (a) That (1) upon all still wines, including vermuth, liqueurs, cordials, artificial or imitation wines or compounds sold as still wine, which contain more than 14 per cent of absolute alcohol, and which are hereafter removed from customhouse for sale or consumption, and (2) upon all of the above which are fortified with, or which contain any product fortified with, grape brandy or wine spirits, and which are hereafter produced in the United States and removed from the place of manufacture, or from bonded premises, for sale or consumption, there shall be levied and collected, in addition to the tax now imposed by law upon such articles, a tax of $1.10 on each proof gallon, and a proportionate tax at a like rate on all fractional parts of such proof gallon, to be levied, collected, and paid under the provisions of existing law.

(b) Upon (1) all of the articles enumerated in subdivision (a) which are hereafter produced in the United States and which are not fortified with, or do not contain any product fortified with, grape brandy or wine spirits, and which are removed from the place of manufacture or from bonded premises for sale or consumption, and (2) all of the articles enumerated in subdivision (a) containing not more than 14 per cent of absolute alcohol, and which are removed from customhouse, place of manufacture, or bonded premises for sale or consumption, there shall be levied and collected, in addition to the tax now imposed by law upon such articles, a tax equivalent to the internal-revenue tax now imposed by law, to be levied, collected, and paid under the provisions of existing law.

(c) Upon champagne, sparkling wines, and artificially carbonated wines hereafter produced in or imported into the United States and removed from customhouse, place of manufacture, or bonded premises for consumption or sale there shall be levied and collected, in addition to the tax now imposed by law upon such articles, a tax equal to double the internal-revenue tax now imposed by law, to be levied, collected, and paid under the provisions of existing law.

(d) Whoever has possession of any empty cask or package which has been used for wine or any article taxable under this section or under subdivision (a) or (c) of section 402 of the act entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," approved September 8, 1916, and on which the stamp or any mark denoting payment of tax has not been effectually destroyed or obliterated, or reuses any such cask or package, having thereon any such stamp or mark previously so used, shall for each such offense be fined not less than $100 nor more than $1,000, or be imprisoned not more than one year, or both; and all such casks or packages, and their contents in the case of reuse, shall be forfeited to the United States.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the senior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] is absent, being, as I understand, at the War Department on departmental business. He has been sent for. My understanding is that he wanted to be heard upon these wine provisions, and I therefore ask that this matter be temporarily passed over until he can return to the Chamber.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator from California has not indicated to me any desire to be heard nor expressed any wish that this section go over. I will ask the Senator from Ohio if he has expressed any such desire to him?

Mr. POMERENE. I can simply say that the Senator from California came to me the other day while he was in the Chamber and said it was thought that these provisions would be taken up, and he was very anxious that they be not taken up at that time. I therefore assume that he wanted to be heard upon the subject.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not think a part of this bill ought to go over when the chairman of the committee has not been requested to have it go over. We shall never get through with this bill if such a procedure is permitted. Let this paragraph be considered, and when the bill comes into the Senate it will again be open to amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, Mr. President, that probably would take up more time than to let the matter go over, for we would then have to have a reconsideration. I will say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that I feel very much as he does about this matter. I think Senators who are interested in sections of this bill ought to stay here and not request their colleagues to ask that matters be passed over for them; but I do know with reference to the Senator from California that he has shown very great interest in this section.

Mr. PENROSE. There is no question about that.

Mr. SIMMONS. And knowing his deep interest in the matter, I rather feel constrained to let it go over for him. It is, however, a bad precedent, and I hope we shall not be compelled to repeat it.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio whether the Senator from California is absent on official business or is out on the river bank watching a prize fight?

Mr. POMERENE. Well, now, Mr. President, I just made the statement that I was advised that the Senator from California was at the War Department on departmental business. His office was communicated with and the request made that they immediately get in touch with him. That is the extent of my information on the subject.

Mr. PENROSE. Does the Senator from Ohio know whether the Senator from California intends to return to the Chamber this afternoon?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am not "my brother's keeper."

Mr. PENROSE. Well, the Senator seems to be his brother's supervisor or messenger in some way, and I thought maybe he could account for his movements.

Mr. POMERENE. No, Mr. President. I simply did for the Senator from California what I would for any other Senator in a matter which was about to come up. I stated a moment ago that the Senator from California came to me, perhaps two or three days ago when this bill was under consideration and it was expected at that time that the wine schedule would be taken up, and he expressed himself as being very anxious not to have it then taken up. I assumed, therefore, that he wanted to be heard upon the matter.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let us not take any more time on this. I feel that I ought to accede to the request.

Mr. PENROSE. I merely wish to state that, realizing the impartial and judicial spirit in which the Senator from California approaches this schedule, I will not make any objection.

Perhaps we will have an illuminating, unselfish contribution as to the character of the paragraph.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the paragraph will be passed over.

Mr. SIMMONS. Sections 310, 311, 312, and 313 all should go over, as they all involve the wine schedule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that section 311 has been agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well, then, if that section has been agreed to. The other three sections, however, involve the wine schedule, and I suppose they will have to go over under the request made on behalf of the Senator from California.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sections 310, 312, and 313 will be passed over, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the next amendment, the one at the top of page 44, was passed over at the instance of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

Mr. SIMMONS. I myself desire that that section go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the section will be passed over. The Secretary will state the next amendment reported by the committee.

The SECRETARY. On page 50, under the heading of "War excise taxes," after "Section 600," the committee propose to strike out all that remains on page 50 and to insert——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment has once been read. Those in favor of the amendment will say "aye"——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask that that section be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMMONS. What is the request of the Senator from Wisconsin?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin suggests that section 600 be passed over.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do that because Senators who are absent have requested to have that section passed over should it be called up when they were not here.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the automobile section?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, sir. It was under discussion, as the Senator will remember, at the time an adjournment was taken when the Senate was last considering committee amendments.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall not object to the section going over.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not think objection ought to be made——

Mr. SIMMONS. I said I did not object.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand that, and I am not addressing myself to the Senator's observation so much as I am to the observation made by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. It has been the custom here in the Senate that when paragraphs which were controverted were reached they have gone over upon request, and I am rather weary of this constant nagging of Senators who ask to have paragraphs passed over. No progress will be made by dealing with this matter in that way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At the request of the Senator from Wisconsin the section indicated will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 51, after line 23, to strike out:

(b) Upon all musical instruments sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer for more than $10 each, and upon piano players, graphophones, phonographs, talking machines, and records used in connection with any musical instrument, piano player, graphophone, phonograph, or talking machine, sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer, a tax equivalent to 5 per cent of the price for which so sold; and

(c) Upon all moving-picture films (which have not been exposed) sold by the manufacturer or importer a tax equivalent to one-half of 1 cent per linear foot; and

(d) Upon all positive moving-picture films (containing a picture ready for projection) sold or leased by the manufacturer, producer, or importer a tax equivalent to 1 cent per linear foot; and

(e) Upon any article commonly or commercially known as jewelry, whether real or imitation, sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer thereof, a tax equivalent to 5 per cent of the price for which so sold; and

(f) Upon all yachts, pleasure boats, motor boats, or other vessels not used or intended to be used for trade, sold by the manufacturer, builder, or importer, a tax equivalent to 5 per cent of the price for which so sold; and.

And insert:

(b) That on the day this act takes effect, and thereafter on July 1 in each year, and also at the time of the original purchase of a new boat by a user, if on any other date than July 1, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid, upon the use of yachts, pleasure boats, power boats, and sailing boats, of over 5 net tons, and motor boats with fixed engines, not used exclusively for trade or national defense, or not built according to plans and specifications approved by the Navy Department, an excise tax to be based on each yacht or boat, at rates as follows: Yachts, pleasure boats, power boats, motor boats with fixed engines, and sailing boats, of over 5 net tons, length not over 50 feet, 50 cents for each foot, length over 50 feet and not over 100 feet, $1 for each foot, length over 100 feet, $2 for each foot; motor boats of not over 5 net tons with fixed engines, $5.

In determining the length of such yachts, pleasure boats, power boats, motor boats with fixed engines, and sailing boats, the measurement of over-all length shall govern.

In the case of a tax imposed at the time of the original purchase of a new boat on any other date than July 1, the amount to be paid shall be the same number of twelfths of the amount of the tax as the number of calendar months, including the month of sale, remaining prior to the following July 1.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 53, after line 19, to insert "SEC. 601. That there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid"; in line 22, before the word "Upon," to strike out "(g)" and insert "(a)"; in line 24, after the word "fishing," to strike out "rods" and insert "rods and"; in line 25, after the word "reels," to strike out "and lines"; on page 54, line 1, after the words "playing cards," to insert "and children's toys and games"; in line 3, before the words "per centum," to strike out "five" and insert "two"; in line 4, before the word "Upon," to strike out "(h)" and insert "(b)"; in line 5, after the word "cosmetics," to strike out "vaselines, petrolatums" and insert "petroleum jellies"; in line 9, after the word "distinguished," to insert "upon all of the above which are"; in line 10, after the word "applied," to insert "or intended to be used or applied"; in line 13, before the words "per centum," to strike out "five" and insert "two"; in line 15, before the word "Upon," to strike out "(i)" and insert "(c)"; in line 19, before the words "of this," to strike out "eight" and insert "fourteen"; on page 55, line 7, before the words "per centum," to strike out "five" and insert "two"; after line 8, to strike out "(j) Upon all chewing gum or substitute therefor sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer, a tax equivalent to 5 per cent of the price for which so sold"; and after line 11 to insert "(d) Upon all cameras sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer a tax equivalent to 2 per cent of the price for which so sold," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 601. That there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid—

(a) Upon all tennis rackets, golf clubs, baseball bats, lacrosse sticks, balls of all kinds, including baseballs, footballs, tennis, golf, lacrosse, billiard and pool balls, fishing rods and reels, billiard and pool tables, chess and checker boards and pieces, dice, games and parts of games, except playing cards and children's toys and games, sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer, a tax equivalent to 2 per cent of the price for which so sold; and

(b) Upon all perfumes, essences, extracts, toilet waters, cosmetics, petroleum jellies, hair oils, pomades, hair dressings, hair restoratives, hair dyes, tooth and mouth washes, dentifrices, tooth pastes, aromatic cachous, toilet soaps and powders, or any similar substance, article, or preparation by whatsoever name known or distinguished, upon all of the above which are used or applied or intended to be used or applied for toilet purposes, and which are sold by the manufacturer, importer, or producer, a tax equivalent to 2 per cent of the price for which so sold; and

(c) Upon all pills, tablets, powders, tinctures, troches or lozenges, sirups, medicinal cordials or bitters, anodynes, tonics, plasters, liniments, salves, ointments, pastes, drops, waters (except those taxed under section 314 of this act), essences, spirits, oils, and all medicinal preparations, compounds, or compositions whatsoever, the manufacturer or producer of which claims to have any private formula, secret, or occult art for making or preparing the same, or has or claims to have any exclusive right or title to the making or preparing the same, or which are prepared, uttered, vended, or exposed for sale under any letters patent or trade-mark, or which, if prepared by any formula, published or unpublished, are held out or recommended to the public by the makers, venders, or proprietors thereof as proprietary medicines or medicinal proprietary articles or preparations, or as remedies or specifics for any disease, diseases, or affection whatever affecting the human or animal body, and which are sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer, a tax equivalent to 2 per cent of the price for which so sold; and

(d) Upon all cameras sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer, a tax equivalent to 2 per cent of the price for which so sold.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 55, line 15, to change the number of the section from "601" to "602"; in the same line, after the word "producer," to strike out "builder"; in line 17, after the word "hundred," to insert "and one"; and in line 21, after the word "Such," to strike out "return" and insert "returns," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 602. That each manufacturer, producer, or importer of any of the articles enumerated in section 601 shall make monthly returns under oath in duplicate and pay the taxes imposed on such articles by this title to the collector of internal revenue for the district in which is located the principal place of business. Such returns shall contain such information and be made at such times and in such manner as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may by regulations prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 55, after line 24, to strike out:

SEC. 602. That upon all articles enumerated in subdivisions (a), (b), (e), (f), (g), (h), (i), or (j) of section 600, which on the day this act is passed are held and intended for sale by any person, corporation, partnership, or association other than a retailer who is not also a wholesaler, and upon all such articles which between April 6, 1917, and the day this act is passed, both inclusive, have been sold to, and on the day this act is passed are held and intended for sale by, a retailer who is not also a wholesaler, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a tax equivalent to 5 per cent of the price paid therefor. This tax shall be paid by the person, corporation, partnership, or association so holding such articles. No tax shall be imposed under section 600 upon any article upon which a tax is imposed under this section.

The taxes imposed by this section shall be assessed, collected, and paid in the same manner as provided in section 1102 in the case of additional taxes upon articles upon which the tax imposed by exisiting law has been paid.

Nothing in this section shall be construed to impose a tax upon articles sold and delivered prior to May 9, 1917, where the title is reserved in the vendor as security for the payment of the purchase money.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 56, line 24, in the headline "Title VII.—War tax on admissions and dues," in line 24, after the word "admissions," to strike out "and dues."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 700, page 56, line 25, after the words "first day of," to strike out "June"; on page 57, line 1, after the word "paid," to insert "(a)"; in the same line, after the word "tax," to strike out "equivalent to" and insert "of"; in line 3, after the word "admission," to strike out "or subscription"; in the same line, after the word "place," to insert "including admission by season ticket or subscription"; in line 4, after the word "person," to strike out "admitted" and insert "making such payment: Provided, That the tax on admission of children where an admission charge for such children is made shall in every case be 1 cent"; in line 7, after the word "and," to insert "(b)"; in line 12, after the words "person so," to strike out "admitted" and insert "admitted; and (c) a tax of 1 cent for each 10 cents or fraction thereof paid for admission to any public performance for profit at any cabaret or other similar entertainment to which the charge for admission is wholly or in part included in the price paid for refreshment, service, or merchandise; the amount paid for such admission to be computed under rules prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, such tax to be paid by the person paying for such refreshment, service, or merchandise; and, in addition to the above, (d) upon tickets of admission to theaters, operas, and other places of amusement, sold at news stands, hotels, and places other than the ticket offices of such theaters, operas, or other places of amusement, at not to exceed 50 cents in excess of the sum of the established price therefor at such ticket offices plus the amount of any tax imposed under clause (a) of this section, a tax equivalent to 5 per cent of the amount of such excess, and if sold for more than 50 cents in excess of the sum of such established price plus the amount of any tax imposed under clause (a) of this section, a tax equivalent to 30 per cent of the whole amount of such excess, such taxes to be paid by the person, corporation, partnership, or association selling such tickets; and, in addition to the above, (e) a tax equivalent to 50 per cent of the amount for which the proprietors, managers, or employees of any opera house, theater, or other place of amusement sell or dispose of tickets or cards of admission in excess of the regular or established price or charge therefor, such tax to be paid by the person, corporation, partnership, or association selling such tickets"; on page 58, line 24, after the word "holder," to strike out "Provided, That the tax on admission of children under 12 years of age where an admission charge is made shall in every case be 1 cent"; on page 59, line 3, after the words "which is 5," to strike out "cents" and insert "cents, or in the case of moving-picture shows the maximum charge for admission to which is 25 cents"; and in line 9, after the words "agricultural fairs," to strike out "all the proceeds of which inure exclusively for agricultural purposes" and insert "nor in respect to admissions to bona fide chautauquas and lyceum courses which are contracted for and guaranteed by local companies, associations, or individuals," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 700. That from and after the 1st day of ———, 1917, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid (a) a tax of 1 cent for each 10 cents or fraction thereof of the amount paid for admission to any place, including admission by season ticket or subscription, to be paid by the person making such payment: Provided, That the tax on admission of children where an admission charge for such children is made shall in every case be 1 cent; and (b) a tax of 5 cents for each admission of each person (except in the case of a bona fide employee and children under 12 years of age and municipal officers on official business) admitted free to any place for admission to which a charge is made, to be paid by the person so admitted; and (c) a tax of 1 cent for each 10 cents or fraction thereof paid for admission to any public performance for profit at any cabaret or other similar entertainment to which the charge for admission is wholly or in part included in the price paid for refreshment, service, or merchandise; the amount paid for such admission to be computed under rules prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, such tax to be paid by the person paying for such refreshment, service, or merchandise; and, in addition to the above, (d) upon tickets of admission to theaters, operas, and other places of amusement, sold at news stands, hotels, and places other than the ticket offices of such theaters, operas, or other places of amusement at not to exceed 50 cents in excess of the sum of the established price therefor at such ticket offices plus the amount of any tax imposed under clause (a) of this section, a tax equivalent to 5 per cent of the amount of such excess, and if sold for more than 50 cents in excess of the sum of such established price plus the amount of any tax imposed under clause (a) of this section, a tax equivalent to 30 per cent of the whole amount of such excess, such taxes to be paid by the person, corporation, partnership, or association selling such tickets; and, in addition to the above, (e) a tax equivalent to 50 per cent of the amount for which the proprietors, managers, or employees of any opera house, theater, or other place of amusement sell or dispose of tickets or cards of admission in excess of the regular or established price or charge therefor, such tax to be paid by the person, corporation, partnership, or association selling such tickets. In the case of persons having the permanent use of boxes or seats in an opera house or any place of amusement or a lease for the use of such box or seat in such opera house or place of amusement there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a tax equivalent to 10 per cent of the amount for which a similar box or seat is sold for performance or exhibition at which the box or seat is used or reserved by or for the lessee or holder. These taxes shall not be imposed in the case of a place the maximum charge for admission to which is 5 cents, or in the case of moving-picture shows the maximum charge for admission to which is 25 cents.

No tax shall be levied under this title in respect to any admissions all the proceeds of which inure exclusively to the benefit of religious, educational, or charitable institutions, societies, or organizations, or admissions to agricultural fairs nor in respect to admissions to bona fide Chautauquas and Lyceum courses which are contracted for and guaranteed by local companies, associations, or individuals.

The term "admission" as used in this title includes seats and tables, reserved or otherwise, and other similar accommodations, and the charges made therefor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 59, after line 16, to strike out:

SEC. 701. That from and after the 1st day of June, 1917, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a tax equivalent to 10 per cent of any amount paid as dues or membership fees (except initiation fees) to any social, athletic, or sporting club or organization; such taxes to be paid by the person making such payments.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 59, line 24, to change the number of the section from "702" to "701"; in line 25, after the word "such," to strike out "admissions, dues, or fees" and insert "admission"; and, on page 60, line 2, after the word "hundred," to strike out "or 701," so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 701. That every person, corporation, partnership, or association (a) receiving any payments for such admission shall collect the amount of the tax imposed by section 700 from the person making such payments, or (b) admitting any person free to any place for admission to which a charge is made shall collect the amount of the tax imposed by section 700 from the person so admitted, and (c) in either case shall make returns and payments of the amounts so collected, at the same time and in the same manner as provided in section 503 of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 60, after line 9, to insert:

Every person, corporation, partnership, or association, liable to the tax imposed by subdivision (d) or (e) of section 700, shall make monthly returns under oath in duplicate and pay the tax imposed by such subdivisions to the collector of internal revenue for the district in which is located the principal place of business. Such returns shall contain such information and be made at such times and in such manner as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may by regulation prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Title VIII.—War-stamp taxes," in section 800, page 60, line 21, after the words "day of," to strike out "June"; on page 61, line 4, after the words "written or," to strike out "printed" and insert "printed" with a comma; in line 5, after the word "signs," to strike out "or issues" and insert "issues, sells, removes, consigns, or ships"; in line 7, before the word "issued," to strike out "or"; and in the same line, after the word "issued," to insert "sold, removed, consigned, or shipped," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 800. That on and after the 1st day of ———, 1917, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, for and in respect of the several bonds, debentures, or certificates of stock and of indebtedness, and other documents, instruments, matters, and things mentioned and described in Schedule A of this title, or for or in respect of the vellum, parchment, or paper upon which such instruments, matters, or things, or any of them are written or printed, by any person, corporation, partnership, or association who makes, signs, issues, sells, removes, consigns, or ships the same, or for whose use or benefit the same are made, signed, issued, sold, removed, consigned, or shipped, the several taxes specified in such schedule.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 801, page 61, line 12, after the word "State," to insert "Territory, or the District of Columbia"; and in line 19, after the word "their," to strike out "shareholders" and insert "shareholders, or by mutual ditch or irrigating companies," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 801. That there shall not be taxed under this title any bond, note, or other instrument, issued by the United States, or by any foreign Government, or by any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or local subdivision thereof, or municipal or other corporation exercising the taxing power, when issued in the exercise of a strictly governmental, taxing, or municipal function; or stocks and bonds issued by cooperative building and loan associations which are organized and operated exclusively for the benefit of their members and make loans only to their shareholders, or by mutual ditch or irrigating companies.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 802, page 61, line 21, after "SEC. 802," to strike out "That whoever makes, signs, issues, or receives, or causes to be made, signed, or issued, any instrument, document, or paper of any kind or description whatsoever, without the tax thereon being duly paid, is guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall pay a fine of not more than $100, at the discretion of the court, for each such offense" and insert:

That whoever—
(a) Makes, signs, issues, or accepts, or causes to be made, signed, issued, or accepted, any instrument, document, or paper of any kind or description whatsoever without the full amount of tax thereon being duly paid;
(b) Consigns or ships, or causes to be consigned or shipped, by parcel post any parcel, package, or article without the full amount of tax being duly paid;
(c) Manufactures or imports and sells, or offers for sale, or causes to be manufactured or imported and sold, or offered for sale, any playing cards, package, or other article without the full amount of tax being duly paid;
(d) Makes use of an adhesive stamp to denote any tax imposed by this title without canceling or obliterating such stamp as prescribed in section 804;
Is guilty of a misdemeanor and, upon conviction thereof, shall pay a fine of not more than $100 for each offense.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 802. That whoever—
(a) Makes, signs, issues, or accepts, or causes to be made, signed, issued, or accepted, any instrument, document, or paper of any kind or description whatsoever without the full amount of tax thereon being duly paid;

(d) Knowingly and without lawful excuse (the burden of proof of such excuse being on the accused) has in possession any washed, restored, or altered stamp, which has been removed from any vellum, parchment, paper, instrument, writing, package, or article,
Is guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000, or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or both, in the discretion of the court, and any such reused, canceled, or counterfeit stamp and the vellum, parchment, document, paper, package, or article upon which it is placed or impressed shall be forfeited to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 804, page 65, line 13, after the word "the," to strike out "person" and insert "person, corporation, partnership, or association"; in line 14, after the word "stamp," to insert "or cause to be written or stamped"; in line 16, before the word "name," to insert "or its"; in line 17, after the word "used," to insert "Provided, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may prescribe such other method for the cancellation of such stamps as he may deem expedient"; and, in line 20, after the word "expedient," to strike out "Whoever fraudulently makes use of an adhesive stamp to denote any tax imposed by this title without so effectually canceling and obliterating such stamp, except as before mentioned, is guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall pay a fine of not exceeding $500, or be imprisoned not more than six months, or both, at the discretion of the court," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 804. That whenever an adhesive stamp is used for denoting any tax imposed by this title, except as hereinafter provided, the person, corporation, partnership, or association using or affixing the same shall write or stamp or cause to be written or stamped thereupon the initials of his or its name and the date upon which the same is attached or used, so that the same may not again be used: Provided, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may prescribe such other method for the cancellation of such stamps as he may deem expedient.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 66, after line 2, to strike out:

SEC. 805. That whenever the stamp required by law has not been affixed to any instrument at the proper time, any party having an interest therein and subsequently desirous of affixing such stamp to said instrument, or, if said instrument be lost, to a copy thereof, may appear before the collecter of internal revenue of the proper district, who shall, upon the payment of the price of the proper stamp and of a penalty of $10, and, where the whole amount of the tax denoted by the stamp required shall exceed the sum of $50, on payment also of interest, at the rate of 6 per cent on said tax from the day on which such stamp ought to have been affixed, affix the proper stamp to such instrument or copy, and note upon the margin thereof the date of his so doing and the fact that such penalty has been paid; and the same shall thereupon be deemed and held to be as valid, to all intents and purposes as if stamped when made or issued: Provided further, That where it shall appear to said collector, upon oath or otherwise, to his satisfaction, that any such instrument has not been duly stamped, at the time of making or issuing the same, by reason of accident, mistake, inadvertence, or urgent necessity, and without any willful design to defraud the United States of the stamp, or to evade or delay the payment thereof, then and in such case, if such instrument, or, if the original be lost, a copy thereof, duly certified by the officer having charge of any record in which such original is required to be recorded, or otherwise duly proven to the satisfaction of the collector, shall, within 12 calendar months after the making or issuing thereof, be brought to the said collector of internal revenue to be stamped, and the stamp tax chargeable thereon shall be paid, the said collector may remit the penalty aforesaid and cause such instrument to be duly stamped.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 67, line 11, to change the number of the section from "806" to "805"; in the same line, before the word "That," to insert "(a)"; in line 16, after the word "affixing," to strike out "and cancellation"; in line 18, after the word "expedient," to strike out "the Commissioner of Internal Revenue"; in line 20 to insert "(b) The Commissioner of Internal Revenue"; on page 68, line 3, after the words "Internal Revenue," to strike out "The adhesive stamps used in the payment of the tax levied in Schedule A of this title shall be furnished for sale by the several collectors of internal revenue, who shall sell and deliver them at their face value to all persons applying for the same, except officers or employees of the Internal Revenue Service: Provided, That such collectors may sell and deliver such stamps in quantities of not less than $100 of face value, with a discount of 1 per cent, except as otherwise provided in this title"; and after line 11 to insert "(c) All internal-revenue laws relating to the assessment and collection of taxes are hereby extended to and made a part of this title, so far as applicable, for the purpose of collecting stamp taxes omitted through mistake or fraud from any instrument, document, paper, writing, parcel, package, or article named herein," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 805. (a) That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall cause to be prepared and distributed for the payment of the taxes prescribed in this title suitable stamps denoting the tax on the document, articles, or thing to which the same may be affixed, and shall prescribe such method for the affixing of said stamps in substitution for or in addition to the method provided in this title as he may deem expedient.

(b) The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is authorized to procure any of the stamps provided for in this title by contract whenever such stamps can not be specdily prepared by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing; but this authority shall expire on the 1st day of January, 1918, except as to imprinted stamps furnished under contract, authorized by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

(c) All internal-revenue laws relating to the assessment and collection of taxes are hereby extended to and made a part of this title, so far as applicable, for the purpose of collecting stamp taxes omitted through mistake or fraud from any instrument, document, paper, writing, parcel, package, or article named herein.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 68, line 18, to change the number of the section from "807" to "806"; in line 22, after the words "United States," to strike out "Each" and insert "The Postmaster General may require each"; in line 23, after the word "postmaster," to strike out "shall be held accountable under his official" and insert "to give additional or increased"; in line 25, after the word "and," to insert "each such postmaster"; and on page 69, line 6, after the word "collections," to strike out "Provided, That adhesive stamps shall be sold by postmasters at their face value without discount," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 806. That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall furnish to the Postmaster General without prepayment a suitable quantity of adhesive stamps to be distributed to and kept on sale by the various postmasters in the United States. The Postmaster General may require each such postmaster to give additional or increased bond as postmaster for the value of the stamps so furnished, and each such postmaster shall deposit the receipts from the sale of such stamps to the credit of and render accounts to the Postmaster General at such times and in such form as he may by regulations prescribe. The Postmaster General shall at least once monthly transfer all collections from this source to the Treasury as internal-revenue collections.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 69, line 9, to change the number of the section from "808" to "807"; in line 19, after the word "hand," to strike out "The collectors shall supply their deputies with a sufficient quantity of such stamps and may sell to other parties within their respective districts who may make application therefor adhesive stamps upon the same terms allowed by law or under the regulations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who is hereby authorized to make such other regulations, not inconsistent herewith, for the security of the United States and the better accommodation of the public, in relation to the matters hereinbefore mentioned, as he may judge necessary and expedient"; and on page 70, line 4, after the word "may," to strike out "also," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 807. That the collectors of the several districts shall furnish without prepayment to any assistant treasurer or designated depositary of the United States located in their respective collection districts a suitable quantity of adhesive stamps for sale. In such cases, the collector may require a bond, with sufficient sureties, to an amount equal to the value of adhesive stamps so furnished, conditioned for the faithful return, whenever so required, of all quantities or amounts undisposed of, and for the payment monthly of all quantities or amounts sold or not remaining on hand. The Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time make such regulations as he may find necessary to insure the safekeeping or prevent the illegal use of all such adhesive stamps.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to inquire of the Senator from North Carolina how long he expects the Senate to remain in session.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to go on until 6 o'clock.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection myself to the particular clauses in the bill that are being considered now; I do not know that anyone has; but I can not very well, myself, be here that long. I wish to make inquiries about some of the amendments that are coming soon, for instance, when we get to page 78. Could we not have an understanding that when we reach that page we will stop for the day? That will go to Title IX, war estate tax. I have not looked it all through, but I think that will finish the stamp taxes. These which are mere matters of form may as well be passed upon.

Mr. SIMMONS. I would not like to agree to stop at page 78, because I think we can reach 78, in all probability, in the next 10 minutes. If the Senator, however, does not desire that title to be taken up this afternoon, I would be very glad to let it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator I have been following the Secretary as well as I can. Sometimes it is difficult to do it, because he hurries through a little more rapidly than one can follow him. I have not been interrupting the reading on some of the matters that have already been passed upon, but they seem to suggest several things for consideration. I am laboring under the impression that probably there has been an agreement that we shall consider first the committee amendments.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is what we are doing now.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to inquire whether there has been such an agreement made.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is an order of the Senate.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, the chairman has passed over section 3, owing to my absence and the absence of my colleague [Mr. JOHNSON], who is out of town to-day on public business. I desire to acknowledge the courtesy. I further desire to say that important business called me from the Senate to the Secretary of War, where I met my colleagues, the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] and the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], on like business, and I was not present at any entertainment at the Sylvan Theater. However, the performance does not begin until 5 o'clock.

Mr. NORRIS. May I inquire of the Senator what is the performance?

Mr. PHELAN. There is an exhibition of the manly art of self-defense, which at this time is quite appropriate. I think it is under the auspices of the District War Service Commission and is for the recreation of soldiers.

Mr. NORRIS. I was wondering if the Senator knew that that is the reason why there are so few Senators here this afternoon attending to business.

Mr. PHELAN. I will not do my colleagues the injustice of intimating anything of that kind. I may say, however, that I just passed the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] going in that direction.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Schedule A.—Stamp taxes," on page 70, line 10, after the words "the first day of," to strike out "June," so as to make the clause read:

1. Bonds of indebtedness: Bonds, debentures, or certificates of indebtedness issued on and after the 1st day of ———, 1917, by any person, corporation, partnership, or association, on each $100 of face value or fraction thereof, 5 cents: Provided, That every renewal of the foregoing shall be taxed as a new issue: Provided further, That when a bond conditioned for the repayment or payment of money is given in a penal sum greater than the debt secured, the tax shall be based upon the amount secured.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to inquire about this amendment. It happens several times. When does the Senator from North Carolina expect to fill the blank?

Mr. SIMMONS. It can not be filled until we are about to pass the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. We can not fill the blank after we pass the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I said it need not be filled until just before we are ready to pass it.

Mr. NORRIS. Why will we be more certain about it then than now?

Mr. SIMMONS. Because we do not know when the bill will be passed.

Mr. NORRIS. We will not know just before we pass it when it will be passed.

Mr. SIMMONS. We might put in instead of the 1st of June the 1st of September.

Mr. NORRIS. But I do not understand that there is any way by which it can be told at any time just when the bill will be passed.

Mr. LODGE. What date does the Senator propose?

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator ought to put in a date with reference to its passage.

Mr. SIMMONS. We are only considering committee amendments at this time.

Mr. NORRIS. But an amendment here is very appropriate.

Mr. SIMMONS. We have stricken out June, because June has passed; but we have not yet offered any amendment inserting the date when the bill will take effect. We are only considering now under the order of the Senate committee amendments.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand the same thing occurred just a short time ago.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator makes a point about it, I will now offer an amendment to put in the 1st day of September, if that will suit him.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not asking my question, I will say to the Senator, in any spirit of criticism. It seems to me that the Senator can not tell now that the 1st of September will do. None of us know the date with reference to the final passage of the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I can put in the provision "to take effect from and after the passage of the act."

Mr. NORRIS. I will ask the Senator why in this case and in the other case he does not use the same provision?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will state to the Senator very frankly the committee thought that we should not fill the blank at this time. The blank, of course, will have to be filled before the bill is passed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 70, after line 18, to strike out:

2. Bonds, indemnity and surety: Bonds for indemnifying any person, corporation, partnership, or corporation who shall have become bound or engaged as surety, and all bonds for the due execution or performance of any contract, obligation, or requirement, or the duties of any office or position, and to account for money received by virtue thereof, and all other bonds of any description, except such as may be required in legal proceedings, not otherwise provided for in this schedule, 50 cents: Provided, That where a premium is charged for the execution of such bond the tax shall be paid at the rate of 1 per cent on each dollar or fractional part thereof of the premium charged: Provided further, That policies of reinsurance shall be exempt from the tax imposed by this subdivision.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 71, after line 8, to insert:

2. Parcel-post packages: Upon every parcel or package weighing more than 4 ounces transported from one point in the United States to another by parcel post, a tax of 1 cent for each 25 cents or fractional part thereof charged for such transportation, to be paid by the consignor.

No such parcel or package shall be transported until a stamp or stamps representing the tax due shall have been affixed thereto.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask that this amendment may go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the proposed amendment will be passed over.

The next amendment was, on page 72, line 1, after the word "this," to strike out "paragraph" and insert "subdivision," so as to make the clause read:

The stamps representing the tax imposed by this subdivision shall be attached to the stock books and not to the certificates issued.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 72, line 14, after the word "shares," to strike out "or certificates"; in line 16, after the word "share," to strike out "or certificate"; and in line 18, after the word "value," to insert "or fraction thereof," so as to read:

4. Capital stock, sales or transfers: On all sales, or agreements to sell, or memorandum of sales or deliveries of, or transfers of legal title to shares or certificates of stock in any association, company, or corporation, whether made upon or shown by the books of the association, company, or corporation, or by any assignment in blank, or by any delivery, or by any paper or agreement or memorandum or other evidence of transfer or sale, whether entitling the holder in any manner to the benefit of such stock or not, on each $100 of face value or fraction thereof, 2 cents, and where such shares of stock are without par value, the tax shall be 2 cents on the transfer or sale or agreement to sell on each share, unless the actual value thereof is in excess of $100 per share, in which case the tax shall be 2 cents on each $100 of actual value or fraction thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 74, line 16, after the word "sale," to insert: "Provided further, That sellers of commodities described herein, having paid the tax provided by this subdivision, may transfer such contracts to a clearing-house corporation or association, and such transfer shall not be deemed to be a sale, or agreement of sale, or an agreement to sell within the provisions of this act, provided that such transfer shall not vest any beneficial interest in such clearing-house association but shall be made for the sole purpose of enabling such clearing-house association to adjust and balance the accounts of the members of said clearing-house association on their several contracts," so as to read:

5. Produce, sales of, on exchange: Upon each sale, agreement of sale, or agreement to sell, including so-called transferred or scratch sales, any products or merchandise at any exchange, or board of trade or other similar place, for future delivery, for each $100 in value of the merchandise covered by said sale or agreement of sale or agreement to sell, 2 cents, and for each additional $100 or fractional part thereof in excess of $100, 2 cents: Provided, That on every sale or agreement of sale or agreement to sell as aforesaid there shall be made and delivered by the seller to the buyer a bill, memorandum, agreement, or other evidence of such sale, agreement of sale, or agreement to sell, to which there shall be affixed a lawful stamp or stamps in value equal to the amount of the tax on such sale: Provided further, That sellers of commodities described herein, having paid the tax provided by this subdivision, may transfer such contracts to a clearing-house corporation or association, and such transfer shall not be deemed to be a sale, or agreement of sale, or an agreement to sell within the provisions of this act, provided that such transfer shall not vest any beneficial interest in such clearing-house association but shall be made for the sole purpose of enabling such clearing-house association to adjust and balance the accounts of the members of said clearing-house association on their several contracts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, line 22, after the word "faith," to strike out "is" and insert "are," so as to make the clause read:

That no bill, memorandum, agreement, or other evidence of such sale, or agreement of sale, or agreement to sell, in case of cash sales of products or merchandise for immediate or prompt delivery which in good faith are actually intended to be delivered shall be subject to this tax.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 76, line 1, after the word "circulation," to strike out "and for each renewal of the same," so as to make the clause read:

6. Drafts or checks payable otherwise than at sight or on demand, promissory notes, except bank notes issued for circulation, for a sum not exceeding $100, 2 cents; and for each additional $100 or fractional part thereof, 2 cents.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 76, after line 3, to insert:

7. Bank check, draft, or certificate of deposit not drawing interest, or order for the payment of any sum of money, drawn upon or issued by any bank, trust company, or any person or persons, companies, or corporations at sight or on demand, 1 cent.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that this amendment may be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SWANSON in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the amendment will be passed over.

The next amendment was, on page 76, line 9, to change the number of the subdivision from "7" to "8."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 76, line 21, to change the number of the subdivision from "8" to "9"; in the same line, after the word "any," where it occurs the second time, to strike out "customhouse and insert "custom-house," so as to make the clause read:

9. Entry of any goods, wares, or merchandise at any custom-house, either for consumption or warehousing, not exceeding $100 in value, 25 cents; exceeding $100 and not exceeding $500 in value, 50 cents; exceeding $500 in value, $1.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 77, line 1, to change the number of the subdivision from "9" to "10."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 77, line 3, to change the number of the subdivision from "10" to "11"; in the same line, after the word "ticket," to insert "one way or round trip"; in line 5, before the word "port," to strike out "foreign"; and in the same line, after the word "place," to insert "not in the United States, Canada, or Mexico," so as to make the clause read:

11. Passage ticket, one way or round trip, for each passenger, sold or issued in the United States for passage by any vessel to a port or place not in the United States, Canada, or Mexico, if costing not exceeding $30, $1; costing more than $30 and not exceeding $60, $3; costing more than $60, $5: Provided, That such passage tickets, costing $10 or less, shall be exempt from taxation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 77, line 10, to change the number of the subdivision from "11" to "12"; and, in line 13, after the word "charitable," to insert "fraternal," so as to make the clause read:

12. Proxy for voting at any election for officers, or meeting for the transaction of business, of any incorporated company or association, except religious, educational, charitable, fraternal, or literary societies, or public cemeteries, 10 cents.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 77, line 15, to change the number of the subdivision from "12" to "13."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 77, line 23, to change the number of the subdivision from "13" to "14"; in line 25, after the words "and sold," to insert "or removed for consumption or sale"; on page 78, line 1, after the word "the," to strike out "passage" and insert "enactment"; in the same line, after the word "act," to insert "if manufactured or imported to sell at retail for not more than 15 cents per pack, a tax of 3 cents per pack; and if manufactured or imported to sell at retail for more than 15 cents per pack"; in line 5, after the word "per," to strike out "pack" and insert "pack" with a period; and in the same line, before the words "in addition," to insert "Such tax shall be paid," so as to make the clause read:

14. Playing cards: Upon every pack of playing cards containing not more than 54 cards, manufactured or imported, and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, after the enactment of this act, if manufactured or imported to sell at retail for not more than 15 cents per pack, a tax of 3 cents per pack; and if manufactured or imported to sell at retail for more than 15 cents a pack, a tax of 8 cents per pack. Such tax shall be paid in addition to the tax imposed under existing law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask the chairman of the committee how much longer he expects to continue in session?

Mr. SIMMONS. As I stated a little while ago, I would like to continue until 6 o'clock.

Mr. POMERENE. I really feel obliged to leave the Chamber. I should like to ask the Senator that section 1101, on page 96, may go over until to-morrow, if that can be done. It relates to second-class postage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection to that. I have no objection to the whole title going over.

Mr. POMERENE. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 78, after line 6, to strike out:

Title IX—War estate tax.

SEC. 900. That in addition to the tax imposed by section 201 of the act entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," approved September 8, 1916, as amended—

(a) A tax equal to the following percentages of its value is hereby imposed upon the transfer of each net estate of every decedent dying after the passage of this act, the transfer of which is taxable under such section (the value of such net estate to be determined as provided in Title II of such act of September 8, 1916):

One-half of 1 per cent of the amount of such net estate not in excess of $50,000;

One per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $50,000 and does not exceed $150,000;

One and one-half per cent of the amount by which net estate exceeds $150,000 and does not exceed $250,000;

Two per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $250,000 and does not exceed $450,000;

Two and one-half per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $450,000 and does not exceed $1,000,000;

Three per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $1,000,000 and does not exceed $2,000,000;

Three and one-half per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $2,000,000 and does not exceed $3,000,000;

Four per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $3,000,000 and does not exceed $4,000,000;

Four and one-half per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $4,000,000 and does not exceed $5,000,000;

Five per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $5,000,000 and does not exceed $8,000,000;

Seven per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $8,000,000 and does not exceed $11,000,000;

Ten per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $11,000,000 and does not exceed $15,000,000; and

Fifteen per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $15,000,000; and

(b) A tax equal to 1 per cent of the value of the net estate not in excess of $25,000 (such value to be determined as provided in Title II of such act of September 8, 1916, except that the exemption provided in subdivision (a) of section 203 of such act shall be $25,000 instead of $50,000) is hereby imposed upon the transfer of the net estate of every resident of the United States dying after the passage of this act.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. NORRIS. Is not the part to be inserted a part of the amendment? As I understand, it is proposed to strike out and insert. If that is true, I will ask that the title go over.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will permit me, the new Title IX is a substitute for Title X. As it stands in the House bill, Title IX has nothing to do with Title X, but is a wholly separate proposition; it is a separate amendment. When we come to Title X it is proposed to strike out and insert.

Mr. NORRIS. Is not there anything proposed to be inserted in lieu of Title IX?

Mr. LODGE. It is not the intention to substitute anything for Title IX.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As the Chair understands, Title IX of the Senate committee amendments takes the place of Title X of the House bill.

Mr. LODGE. It takes the place of Title X. An excise consumption tax is provided in place of tariff duties.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that Title IX in the House bill, commencing on page 78, the war estate tax, is stricken out?

Mr. LODGE. That is stricken out.

Mr. NORRIS. And nothing has been put in its place?

Mr. LODGE. No.

Mr. SIMMONS. There is nothing put in the place of the war estate tax at all.

Mr. NORRIS. The committee in its bill, then, has no such thing as a war estate tax?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; the Senate committee struck that out and substituted nothing for it; but the next title of the House bill, which was Title X, which relates to the tax on coffee and tea, was stricken out and Title IX of the Senate committee amendments was substituted for it.

Mr. NORRIS. I am going to ask the Senator to let Title IX go over. I do not know that I will want to have anything to say in opposition to striking it out, but I should like to have it go over for the present.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the war estate tax.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; the war estate tax.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection to that title going over.

Mr. NORRIS. The request of the Senator from Ohio was, as I understood, that Title X should also go over.

Mr. SIMMONS. No.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the request of the Senator from Ohio was that the provisions on page 96, relating to increased rates on postage, go over.

Mr. SIMMONS. Title X relates to coffee and tea.

Mr. NORRIS. In the case of that title the committee struck out the House provision and inserted a new provision.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I will ask that that go over. My idea is, I will say to the Senator from North Carolina—I had that in mind when I made the request——

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection to that title going over. That is a general provision, and there may be Senators who are interested in it and who may desire to discuss it.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know, I will say to the Senator, that I will have anything to say about it, but there are several Senators who I am satisfied want to be heard upon it. In fact, I have heard Senators who are not now present express views on the substance of these titles, and who I think desire to be here when they are considered.

Mr. LODGE. I think that is a very reasonable request; but we might dispose of the administrative provisions on page 88, to which I am sure there is no objection at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As the Chair understands the request of the Senator from Nebraska, it is that, beginning on page 78, line 7, all down to and including page 88, line 17, embracing Titles IX and X, be passed over. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Secretary will now read, commencing on page 88, line 17.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 88, line 17, to change the number of the title in subhead from "XI" to "X."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 88, line 18, to change the number of the section from "1100" to "1000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 89, line 8, to change the number of the section from "1101" to "1001."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 89, line 18, to change the number of the section from "1102" to "1002"; in line 22, after the word "shall," to insert "within 30 days after its enactment" and in line 25, after the word "prescribe," to strike out "The tax shown to be due by such return shall be collected, by assessment, and paid on or before November 1, 1917," and insert "Payment of the tax shown to be due may be extended to a date not exceeding four months from the enactment of this act, upon the filing of a bond for payment in such form and amount and with such sureties as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 1002. That where additional taxes are imposed by this act upon articles or commodities upon which the tax imposed by existing law has been paid, the person, corporation, partnership, or association required by this act to pay the tax shall, within 30 days after its enactment, make return under oath in such form and under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe. Payment of the tax shown to be due may be extended to a date not exceeding four months from the enactment of this act, upon the filing of a bond for payment in such form and amount and with such sureties as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 90, line 9, to change the number of the section from "1103" to "1003"; and in the same line, before the word "all," to strike out "In" and insert "That in," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 1003. That in all cases where the method of collecting the tax imposed by this act is not specifically provided, the tax shall be collected in such manner as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe. All administrative and penalty provisions of Title VIII of this act, in so far as applicable, shall apply to the collection of any tax which the Commissioner of Internal Revenue determines or prescribes shall be paid by stamp.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 90, line 18, to change the number of the section from "1104" to "1004."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 91, line 6, to change the number of the section from "1105" to "1005."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 91, line 10, to change the number of the section from "1106" to "1006."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 91, line 20, to change the number of the section from "1107" to "1007"; in line 23, after the word "article," to strike out "(or, in the case of moving-picture films, such a contract with a dealer, exchange, or exhibitor, for the sale or lease thereof)"; on page 92, line 1 after the word "or," to change the number of the title from "X" to "IX"; in line 2, after the word "subdivision," to strike out "13" and insert "14"; in line 5, after the word "vendee," to strike out "or lessee"; in line 6, after the word "vendor," to strike out "or lessor"; in line 9, after the word "vendee," to strike out "or lessee"; in line 10, after the word "vendor," to strike out "or lessor"; in line 11, after the word "sale," to strike out "or lease"; and in line 12, after the word "vendor," to strike out "or lessor," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 1007. That (a) if any person, corporation, partnership, or association has prior to May 9, 1917, made a bona fide contract with a dealer for the sale, after the tax takes effect, of any article upon which a tax is imposed under Title III, IV, VI, or IX, or under subdivision 14 of Schedule A of Title VIII, or under this section, and (b) if such contract does not permit the adding of the whole of such tax to the amount to be paid under such contract, then the vendee shall, in lieu of the vendor, pay so much of such tax as is not so permitted to be added to the contract price.

The taxes payable by the vendee under this section shall be paid to the vendor at the time the sale is consummated, and collected, returned, and paid to the United States by such vendor in the same manner as provided in section 503.

The term "dealer" as used in this section includes a vendee who purchases any article with intent to use it in the manufacture or production of another article intended for sale.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 92, line 18, to change the number of the section from "1108" to "1008," and in line 19, after the word "act," to insert "not payable by stamp," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 1008. That in the payment of any tax under this act not payable by stamp a fractional part of a cent shall be disregarded unless it amounts to one-half cent or more, in which case it shall be increased to 1 cent.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 92, after line 22, to insert:

SEC. 1009. That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may, under regulations prescribed by him with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, require all internal-revenue taxpayers, who are required by law to render returns, to pay without prior levy, assessment, or notice, and at the same time as the return is required to be made, any such internal-revenue tax, any provision of law fixing any other time as the time when such tax is due to the contrary notwithstanding. All penalties provided by existing law for failure to render return and pay tax when due are hereby made applicable to any failure to pay the tax at the time required by such regulations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 93, after line 11, to insert:

SEC. 1010. That collectors of internal revenue are authorized to receive at par certificates of indebtedness issued under section 6 of the act entitled "An act to authorize an issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to extend credit to foreign governments, and for other purposes," approved April 24, 1917, and uncertified checks in payment of income and war-profits taxes, during such time and under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe; but if a check so received is not paid by the bank on which it is drawn the person by whom such check has been tendered shall remain liable for the payment of the tax and for all legal penalties and additions the same as if such check had not been tendered.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I ask that "Title XI.—Postal rates and war tax on profits of publications" be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the title will be passed over.

Mr. SIMMONS. The next amendment comes on page 99, the income-tax provision.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 99, after line 15, it is proposed to insert "Title XII.—Income-tax amendments."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, that is a very important amendment, and I do not suppose the Senator wants to adopt that formally. I have an idea there will be considerable debate on the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. There are a number of amendments under that title.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Massachusetts suggests there are quite a number of amendments under that title, but I presume they all refer to the question of incomes.

Mr. SIMMONS. What is the request of the Senator?

Mr. NORRIS. I hope the Senator will not ask that the Senate take up the income-tax amendments to-night and pass on them formally.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator desire all the income-tax amendments to go over?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. That embraces the remainder of the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Then the Senator had better adjourn or take a recess. I know there are a number of Senators who want to debate that title. It is one of the most important features of the bill, and I do not think it can be passed without more Senators present than are here at this time.

Mr. SIMMONS. There are in that section, I will state to the Senator, two very important amendments in regard to which there will probably be controversy. One of them is what is known as the Jones amendment, relating to the undistributed surplus of corporations. I would not desire to take those up this afternoon, but to the remainder of that title I do not think there is any objection.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I suggest to the Senator that the hour is late and that he move a recess or adjournment at this time.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well.

PETITIONS.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Venice, Cal., praying for the use of military transports on the return trip from Europe to bring military prisoners to America to be employed on agricultural development and other public work, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the board of directors of the Los Angeles Realty Board of California, praying the curtailment of passenger service and the less important freight service in order to secure a more abundant transportation and supply of coal for the coming winter, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A bill (S. 2797) granting an increase of pension to John L. Downing (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 2798) granting an increase of pension to Hamilton Collier (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 2799) granting an increase of pension to William A. De Long (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KING:

A bill (S. 2800) to punish seditious opposition to the laws and seditious attempts to procure the breach of contracts with the United States or relating to the production of commodities for the use of the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. OWEN:

A bill (S. 2801) to authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to require carriers subject to the act to regulate commerce to purchase, construct, or otherwise provide and furnish cars, equipment, and facilities of shipment, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. 2802) to amend the act to regulate commerce, as amended, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. 2803) to establish an interstate-marketing system, and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. 2804) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to require interstate carriers to provide and furnish particular types of cars to shippers; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

INTERSTATE-MARKETING SYSTEM.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I present a paper relative to the method of arrangement and operation of the national county cooperative marketing corporation, as provided in a bill which I have introduced. I desire to have the article printed as a public document, and I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Printing for report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The matter will be referred to the Committee on Printing for action.

RECESS.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m., Thursday, August 16, 1917) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, August 17, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, August 17, 1917.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, August 15, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Before the Senator proceeds, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hardwick	Martin	Sherman
Bankhead	Hollis	Myers	Simmons
Brady	Husting	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Broussard	Johnson, Cal.	New	Smoot
Calder	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Sterling
Chamberlain	Kellogg	Overman	Sutherland
Colt	King	Page	Swanson
Culberson	Kirby	Penrose	Trammell
Curtis	Knox	Phelan	Vardaman
Dillingham	La Follette	Pittman	Wadsworth
Fletcher	Lodge	Ransdell	Weeks
Frelinghuysen	McCumber	Saulsbury	Williams
Gronna	McKellar	Shafroth
Hale	McNary	Sheppard

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. HUGHES] on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. MYERS. My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. KIRBY. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I will let this announcement stand for the present.

I wish also to announce the absence of the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], and the absence of the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], on account of illness in their families. I will let this announcement stand for the present.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. KING. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] are detained from the Senate on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

THE I. W. W. MENACE.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, although the Senate of the United States is an unusually well-informed body of men, I find nevertheless a number of Senators are not familiar with just what the I. W. W. menace throughout the Western States means.

With the I. W. W.'s perjury is a fine art. With this organization murder is reduced to a science, and after the I. W. W. slays its unoffending victim the accused and guilty person frequently escapes conviction by reason of a prearranged alibi, because, as I said, the I. W. W. has reduced perjury to a fine art.

At a later time I expect to deal with this subject and explain some of the views and activities of this treasonable organization, but this morning I will simply ask to have the Secretary read at the desk a short extract from a very reliable Arizona weekly newspaper which gives some illumination upon the activities and views of the I. W. W. I have frequently been asked what "I. W. W." means. It means simply, solely, and only "Imperial Wilhelm's Warriors."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested. The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the Graham Guardian, Aug. 10, 1917.]

GOVERNMENT SHOULD ACT.

The I. W. W. menace might be easily handled and put out of existence if the Federal Government would get busy and place the arch enemy of all governments, William Haywood, behind the bars on a charge of treason in the time of war.

Along with Haywood should go every member of the I. W. W., a special effort being made to get the big leaders first. No sympathizer of the I. W. W. propaganda should enjoy the liberty of this country only long enough to place him in jail to wait his trial for treason.

There is no room in this country for people like Haywood, Berkman, and the female species represented by Emma Goldman. No form of government suits them, because they do not believe in governments.

As evidence of the total depravity of the followers of Haywood the following verse from the I. W. W. songbook is given:

"Onward Christian soldier, rip and tear and smite;
"Let the gentle Jesus bless your dynamite;
"Smash the doors of every home, pretty maidens seize;
"Use your might and sacred right to treat her as you please."

This particular verse exemplifies to the fullest degree just what the I. W. W. are, what they believe in, and what they would do if they ever got in power in this or any other country.

WAR REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, when the war-revenue bill went to the House, in May, 1917, it was estimated, through the Secretary of the Treasury, that to meet the appropriations which had already been made for the year ending June 30, 1918, the sum of $2,245,925,587.54 must be raised, and this amount was needed over and above present receipts and the sums received from the sale of bonds.

When the bill reached the Senate from the House it was drawn so as to provide for the raising of about $1,800,000,000, and we were told about July 1 that the bill to be reported to the Senate from the Committee on Finance was framed so as to raise about $1,250,000,000, but when the bill was reported, August 6, we find that it provided for the raising of $2,000,000,000. When this bill was reported to the House it was supposed that it provided for the raising of all the additional funds that would be required by the Government for the year ending June 30, 1918; but on July 26, 1917, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury was sent to the Speaker of the House of Representatives containing deficiency and supplemental estimates for the War Department to the amount of $5,917,878,347.98, and we are advised in the morning papers that the additional amount needed by the Government will reach $9,000,000,000. There is quite a difference between the figures submitted in the estimates sent to the House in May, those contained in the bill as it passed the House in June, and those contained in the bill reported to the Senate on the 6th day of this month, and now comes the additional estimates for nearly $6,000,000,000 to add to the burden already on our hands.

We were told by the able chairman of the committee, in his opening speech, that it was intended by this bill to raise what balance was needed to meet the appropriations heretofore made. There is no intimation as to how the amount of $5,917,878,347.98 called for in the estimate of July 26 is to be raised. The Congress has already appropriated the sum of $9,103,086,707.11 for the year ending June 30, 1918, and the estimate mentioned a moment ago calls for $5,917,000,000 more, and we are told that we may expect other estimates before the year is out. If no more is added, we will have appropriated for this year the enormous sum of $15,030,965,155.09. If you add the additional three billions mentioned in the morning papers, the total amount needed for the first year will be above $18,000,000,000.

Mr. President, I submit that the Congress should be advised, as soon as possible, just what amount of revenue must be raised for the year ending June 30, 1918, and then Congress should determine upon a plan which will best distribute the sum in accordance with ability to bear it.

The people at home are the force back of the Government, and they have a right to know what is going on. If the Government will only take the people into its confidence and tell them just what is needed and for what purpose the funds raised by taxation and bond issues are to be used, and if it will assure the people that there will be the strictest economy in all expenditures, that new undertakings will be limited to the smallest number possible, that all "pork-barrel" appropriations will be eliminated, that no favoritism will be shown in the letting of contracts, and that the lowest responsible bidders will be favored, then it will find the people ready and willing to do their full duty.

I favored a joint committee of the House and Senate to examine into expenditures because I believed such a committee would be helpful to the administration and to Congress and would inspire confidence.

I favored it for another reason, Mr. President. A few weeks ago a distinguished Senator stood upon the floor and asked any Senators to advise him what had been done by the Defense Board. No Senator was able to give that Senator the information which he desired. I submit if we had a joint committee, and a Senator asked for information, he would obtain it, because that committee would be advised.

The taxes should be equitably distributed, and the plan of taxation should not add unnecessary burdens upon the poorer people, nor should it cripple industry nor injure business, and no tax should be retroactive.

The business men of the country have expressed their willingness to pay as large a tax as possible, but they do not wish to have their business taxed out of existence.

The working people have expressed their desire to help in every way, but they ask to be protected from all unscrupulous dealers and all gamblers in the necessaries of life.

The farmers and stock raisers have shown their loyalty by increasing their production to the fullest extent.

A great majority of the people of the country are doing their part, and this they will continue to do as long as it is necessary. We all hope the war may soon end, but no one can tell how long it will last, and it is our duty to prepare for a long contest and one of the greatest magnitude.

To finance the war means that we should have a well-formed and comprehensive program. A wise plan adopted now will enable the Government to raise all funds that may be needed without disorganizing our country, injuring our credit, or shaking the confidence of our people.

While Congress should hasten in doing everything that is needed for the Army and Navy and the conduct of the war, it should carefully deliberate and take its time when it comes to considering the tax laws by which the growing billions of war expenditures are to be provided. The measures should be drawn so no one section would be given an advantage over any other section of the country, and the laws enacted to meet the emergency should end when the emergency ceases; and the people must know that the war measures are temporary and are not to be used as precedents for the future.

No taxes should be levied which will deprive any of our people of the common necessaries and comforts of life.

The expenses of the war, as far as possible, should be paid by those who are making large profits out of war contracts, those who have large incomes and the luxuries which only the rich can afford.

A heavy tax should be collected from the immense profits that are being made on war contracts. The papers claim that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] states the profits to have been about $4,000,000,000 the last year. The report of the committee fixes the amount at $3,000,000,000, and estimates that the war profits will be much larger this year. I have not had time to look into the question, but no one doubts that the profits have been large, and those who have made these great profits should not hesitate to pay a large amount in the way of taxes, and this measure should be drawn so as to require them to pay their full share of the burdens of the war.

One of the New York papers contained an article to the effect that one large corporation had reported a profit of $146,000,000 made in 91 days. The chairman of the committee referred to several large concerns which were making enormous profits out of war contracts. In view of these reports, is it not reasonable to estimate the war profits this year at $4,000,000,000?

There should be a readjustment of the rates of the income tax, the rates on normal incomes should be low, and the rates on large incomes should be increased so as to make immense incomes pay a fair and just proportion of the cost of the war.

I do not believe it necessary to lower the exemptions now allowed to heads of families. The sum of $360,006,141.70 was raised from the income tax for the year ending June 30, 1917, and it is claimed in the report on the pending bill that an additional sum of $777,700,000 will be raised by it.

There should be a heavy tax upon imported luxuries, the importation of which for the calendar year, according to newspaper reports, amounted to about $500,000,000. It seems to me that it would be an easy matter to raise $300,000,000 revenue each year from such an importation of luxuries, and surely the people of this country who can and do afford the luxuries imported should be willing to pay a little extra tax for the privilege.

To the amount raised on war profits, incomes, and imported luxuries could be added the sum that will be derived from taxes on a large number of other items now in the bill and a tax on domestic luxuries, and it would justify the elimination of all war taxes on necessaries, and this should be done.

If the above items will not produce enough revenue, it is estimated that the inheritance tax would raise $100,000,000. If a reasonable tax were assessed on all inheritances of over $100,000, with progressive rates on amounts in excess of $100,000, a much larger sum could be had. Of course, in fixing the amount of the inheritance tax, due allowance should be made for such taxes levied by States.

It has been stated by a student of the tariff that a much larger sum could be realized from duties on imports, and I understand that it is estimated that from $210,000,000 to $230,000,000 will be raised from the custom duties this year, and if the duties of the Payne tariff law were now being collected, I am informed that the sum of $450,000,000 would be raised. If this is so, then a small increase in the duties on imported luxuries would run the amount up to $600,000,000.

It seems to me that the measure contains some provisions which will place unjust burdens upon people who are unable to bear them—the burdens of such people are too heavy now—but these items in the bill will be referred to when amendments are being considered. I am opposed to the war excise tax on coffee, tea, cocoa, and sugar, and, as advised now, will vote against the tax on these articles. I am also opposed to the tax imposed by the bill on some other necessities. Instead of taxing the poor man's breakfast table, why not increase the tax on luxuries?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, one of the principal items of expense, to cover which this bill is reported to the Senate, is the expense connected with the purchase and the building of ships. In the month of April last I called the attention of the Senate to the enormous devastation by U boats upon the tonnage of the world, and, with all the available figures and data which I could then collect, I showed conclusively, I thought, that it was only a question of time when the tonnage of the world would be so reduced as to compel an unfavorable peace. At that time I introduced a joint resolution providing that the Navy Department should offer a fair sum of money to any man or men who would succeed in producing any character of mechanism that would protect a merchant ship against the submarine torpedo. That joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. There was no action of that committee, and I again called the matter up. The acting chairman of the committee at that time assured me and assured the Senate that the Navy Department was giving proper and adequate consideration to that subject and to like subjects, and also indicated very clearly that in a very short time, indeed, the Navy Department would have developed a mechanism that would protect our merchant ships, and that the submarine menace would be met. I did not agree with the Senator making that statement, and insisted that all of the energies of the department were directed not toward the defense of ships but toward the extinction of the submarine, and that the only hope lay in providing a defense against the torpedo.

I then called upon an officer connected with the department and ascertained from him that the merchant ships could be protected, but that the cost of the protection was so great that the owners preferred to pay the extra expense in insurance—and it will be remembered that the Government was the insurer—rather than the extra expense which the protection of the ship would involve. The result has been that millions of tonnage of the best British, American, French, and neutral ships have been sunk in the sea, and their cargoes have been lost to us and to our allies.

Being somewhat impatient, I then introduced a resolution asking for information as to what the department had succeeded in accomplishing in the way of protecting the ships against the submarines. The answer which was received from the department was to the effect, practically, that nothing whatever had been accomplished.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to have an editorial read into the RECORD, with the hope that some ray of the light of truth contained in the article may penetrate through the keyhole into the Naval Committee room, and that that committee may awake from its peaceful dreams and ascertain whether or not there is in reality any truth in this editorial; whether or not it is possible to protect our merchant shipping against the torpedo; and, if there is any hope of so doing, that they will exert some activity toward that end. I especially wish to call the attention of that committee to the fact that it is charged that the insurance rates made by the Government itself are such as to discourage any attempt on the part of the owners of vessels to protect them against torpedo attacks.

If it is possible for us to save our shipping and save the tonnage of the world, it is time, Mr. President, that the Senate was taking some active steps. If the Navy Department is unable to solve the problem, then the Senate, acting through the Committee on Naval Affairs, ought to attempt to do something. I therefore especially invite the attention of the Senate to the editorial which is printed in this morning's Washington Post, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the reading of the editorial? Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

A CERTAIN WAY TO SAVE SHIPS.

The submarine situation was discussed with unusual freedom yesterday by Premier Lloyd George. He expressed confidence that the food stock on hand and in prospect would enable England, with ordinary economy, to defy the submarine operations so far as starving the people was concerned. Apparently, however, he did not go into particulars regarding the growing shortage of shipping for munitions purposes.

During April 560,000 gross tons of British shipping were destroyed by submarines. In July the loss was 320,000 gross tons. Mr. Lloyd George said that the net loss since unrestricted submarine warfare commenced was "under 250,000 tons a month." The new construction for the first six months of this year amounted to 404,000 tons, and the last six months would see 1,424,000 tons added, including purchases.

These figures pertain to Great Britain. The purchases of vessels do not add to the common stock of tonnage possessed by the allies, of course. With destruction of British shipping at the rate of 250,000 tons a month, and new building at the rate of only 67,300 tons a month, Mr. Lloyd George's figures show that Great Britain would be 200,000 tons short at the end of a year. Since the destruction of neutral and allied shipping is also very large, and the restoration small, the fact is clearly established that German submarines are steadily and surely destroying the world's shipping.

There is a deadly meaning in this to the United States. Is it supposed that this Nation can make its resources effective in Europe if there is no way of getting to Europe? If ships are built without protection against torpedoes, merely to dash across the ocean and take their chances against submarines, the proportion of losses in men and material may be staggering. Could the United States look upon the loss of 250,000 tons a month with anything but extreme concern? This would be equivalent to 25 ships of 10,000 tons each, some of them transports with soldiers aboard.

The opinion has been expressed by American naval experts that merchant vessels can and should be protected against torpedoes. Gen. Goethals's plans for steel ships provided for such protection. The naval advisory board went over these plans and approved them, and has recommended that shipowners apply similar protection to their vessels. But there is no law to compel owners to protect ships by reconstruction, stowing of cargo, and otherwise. On the contrary, the war-risk insurance provided by the Government is sufficient to make shipowners indifferent as to the fate of their vessels. So far as the Government has acted at all, it has discouraged the protecting of private merchant vessels against torpedoes.

Now, all suitable merchant vessels are subject to Government supervision. They are to be operated by their owners or charterers according to directions issued by the United States Shipping Board. Why should not the Shipping Board require that all vessels be fitted with protective devices and be loaded according to the methods suggested by the Naval Advisory Board? Vessels so protected and so loaded can survive the damage done by a single torpedo. Certain cargoes properly stowed will enable vessels to reach port, even if struck by two or even three torpedoes. With an alert gun crew to engage the submarine on sight, vessels so protected could cross the Atlantic in defiance of submarines. They might be wounded, but they would not be lost; their passengers and freight would be delivered instead of being sunk; and they would occasionally sink a submarine.

The shipowners have shown that they care nothing for ships, sailors' lives, or valuable cargoes so long as the Government grants cheap war insurance. The owners will not expend an extra dollar for protective devices or changed methods of stowage unless compelled to do so. Is it not time that the Government should take these rapacious interests by the throat and force them to cooperate in winning the war?

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to call attention to the fact, Mr. President, that the board has approved devices which it is claimed will protect ships. If that be true, then we are criminally negligent if we do not compel the use of such devices, whether or not the owner of a ship is willing to take his chances with insurance.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if there is anything in the law or the regulations that would prohibit the department from refusing to insure a ship and its cargo that would not take these precautions?

Mr. McCUMBER. I know of no such regulations; but the Government has entire control over the matter of construction of American ships, and it can compel every ship that takes out American registry to be supplied with those appliances if they are of any value.

Mr. KIRBY. Does the Senator understand that the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance under the Treasury Department is insuring ships and cargoes that refuse to comply with the regulations?

Mr. McCUMBER. The Government has made no regulations concerning the use of such safety devices. There is where the trouble lies; and what I am insisting is that the Government should impose such regulations and compel every shipowner to conform to them before any insurance is given. It may be more profitable to the shipowner to insure his ship than to protect it by any device. But the Government can not afford to lose either the ship or its cargo. Both are of vital necessity to the Government in this war.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I ask that the Secretary read first the amendments passed over yesterday at the request of different Senators, beginning with the amendment known as section 310, on page 34, the wine schedule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 34, after line 7, the committee proposes to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 310. (a) That (1) upon all still wines, including vermuth, liqueurs, cordials, artificial or imitation wines or compounds sold as still wine, which contain more than 14 per cent of absolute alcohol, and which are hereafter removed from customhouse for sale or consumption, and (2) upon all of the above which are fortified with, or which contain any product fortified with, grape brandy or wine spirits, and which are hereafter produced in the United States and removed from the place of manufacture or from bonded premises for sale or consumption, there shall be levied and collected, in addition to the tax now imposed by law upon such articles, a tax of $1.10 on each proof gallon, and a proportionate tax at a like rate on all fractional parts of such proof gallon, to be levied, collected, and paid under the provisions of existing law.

(b) Upon (1) all of the articles enumerated in subdivision (a) which are hereafter produced in the United States and which are not fortified with, or do not contain any product fortified with, grape brandy or wine spirits, and which are removed from the place of manufacture or from bonded premises for sale or consumption, and (2) all of the articles enumerated in subdivision (a) containing not more than 14 per cent of absolute alcohol, and which are removed from customhouse, place of manufacture, or bonded premises, for sale or consumption, there shall be levied and collected in addition to the tax now imposed by law upon such articles, a tax equivalent to the internal-revenue tax now imposed by law, to be levied, collected, and paid under the provisions of existing law.

(c) Upon champagne, sparkling wines, and artificially carbonated wines, hereafter produced in or imported into the United States and removed from customhouse, place of manufacture, or bonded premises, for sale or consumption, there shall be levied and collected, in addition to the tax now imposed by law upon such articles, a tax equal to double the internal-revenue tax now imposed by law, to be levied, collected, and paid under the provisions of existing law.

(d) Whoever has possession of any empty cask or package which has been used for wine or any article taxable under this section or under subdivision (a) or (e) of section 402 of the act entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," approved September 8, 1916, and on which the stamp or any mark denoting payment of tax has not been effectually destroyed or obliterated, or reuses any such cask or package, having thereon any such stamp or mark previously so used, shall for each such offense be fined not less than $100 nor more than $1,000, or be imprisoned not more than one year, or both; and all such casks or packages, and their contents in the case of reuse, shall be forfeited to the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] I see is now in the Chamber. I call his attention to the fact that section 310 now under consideration was passed over yesterday at the request of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], upon the statement that the Senator from California desired to be heard on it.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, we are discussing a revenue measure, and I must assume that the Senate is interested only in that phase of the wine controversy which affects the revenue. There is certainly no attempt being made now to restrict the use of wine, although the most effective way to destroy an industry is to tax it to death. But I do not believe that there is any purpose, either on the part of the committee or on the part of the Senate, to restrict the manufacture or use of wine by this indirect method, and the only object of the Senate is to provide adequate revenue for the extraordinary purposes of the Government.

It so happens that the State of California produces 90 per cent of all the wine made in the United States; therefore the tax does not in an economic sense affect to any degree, certainly not to the same degree, other American communities. Hence it has always been incumbent upon the representatives of California in this body to explain the situation. Needless to say, the great State of California is not seeking in any manner to avoid the payment of its just dues. I am sure this industry, in common with all other industries of California, will pay every last cent necessary for the conduct of this war, and the only plea I am making to-day is not in avoidance of taxation, but in defense of the life of the industry itself. I am advised by those most competent to judge that the tax proposed by the committee would certainly be destructive to the sweet-wine industry of California.

There are dry wines and there are sweet wines. The dry wines contain less than 14 per cent of alcohol, the sweet wines in excess of 14 per cent. The sweet wine is of comparatively recent development. The Franciscan fathers, 150 and more years ago, brought the vine to California, the mission grape, and it has grown with the State; and I may offer in evidence the State of California—one of which I am sure the Union is proud—as an exhibit of the little damage that has been done to the population over a period of 150 years during which period the vine has been cultivated.

But, as I said, the sweet wine is of comparatively recent origin. One of our wine makers—they had all become proficient in the making of wines; it is an industry that is handed down from father to son—went to Spain and discovered that sweet wines as well as dry wines could be made in California by a little encouragement from the Government. The market is about equally divided between the two varieties. Brandy was then taxed at $1.10 a gallon for all purposes, and hence that made the making of sweet wines prohibitive, because wine spirits or brandy had to be used to overcome the natural fermentation of the grape; not to strengthen the product, but to arrest the fermentation, because otherwise the fermentation would go on and produce an excessive degree of alcohol or the wine become sour. So it was necessary to add brandy to check the natural fermentation of the grapes. But these men who had discovered in Spain the secret of making sweet wines and found that brandy used in fortification was not taxed there at all, whereas spirits were highly taxed, about 18 years ago got from Congress a concession of a 3-cent rate instead of a $1.10 rate, where the brandy was used only for making the sweet wine. Hence, during that period of about 17 years the sweet-wine industry has grown and developed. Now it is proposed to put the brandy used in the fortification of sweet wine—that is, for arresting the fermentation—upon practically the same basis as commercial brandy. If that is done, I say with absolute confidence, from the information which I have, that the sweet-wine industry will be destroyed. That may not interest you; your communities have no sweet-wine industry; but it does interest the Secretary of the Treasury. It should interest the Finance Committee of the Senate, because if that industry is destroyed there will be no revenue derived from it. If this is true, certainly it should arrest the attention of the Senate.

This same contest was made, you may recollect, a year ago. The Senate was obdurate. It insisted not on $1.10, which is proposed now, but on 55 cents a gallon on brandy used in fortification, and it was told that the 55-cent rate was destructive. However, the measure was passed, and the Senator from California was required, pursuing the subject, to bring the matter before the conferees. The Senate raised the House rate and it went to conference, and the conference, heeding the argument—not interested in the wine, but looking for the revenue—reduced the rate to a living basis. Now the House sends up an increased schedule, which the wine growers will accept, raising dry wine from 4 to 6 cents; the Senate committee has added 2 cents more, making it 8 cents; and that 50 per cent increase proposed by the House can, I believe, be met by the dry-wine makers, so I will make no argument on that, except that the Finance Committee, in a blind endeavor, I contend, to raise revenue has raised everything.

This is a sort of a horizontal-revenue bill. Everything has to be raised on the same plane, irrespective of the individual merits of one commodity or another.

The Senate was told at that time that if its purpose was to raise revenue, the House rates, which were carefully studied and gone into, would produce the maximum of revenue, while allowing the industry to live. What results did we get?

In 1914 the tax on sweet wine was 8 cents a gallon, plus 15 cents for brandy used in fortification—a total of 23 cents. That is the rate which bore so heavily upon the industry that it began to dwindle, because the sweet wine sells for only 35 cents a gallon. There was a tax of 23 cents a gallon imposed by what is known as the emergency-tax law of 1914, whose life was limited by the act itself to one year. Under that act $2,805,000 was collected from wine as revenue. You will see, Senators, that the amounts involved are insignificant and hardly justify the time of the Senate taken by me in explaining the matter, in view of the enormous revenues we are raising from sources which can well afford to pay, and in view of the extraordinary expenditures. This does not involve the raising of more than $6,000,000 all told from this industry; but, small as it is compared to the larger figures, it is sufficiently burdensome to destroy one of your sources of taxation.

I say that burdensome tax, which was light compared to the one now proposed, was 23 cents. I should say that this act proposed by the committee would tax sweet wine 60 cents. It is selling for 35 cents. I say that that act produced $2,805,000. In 1916 the 8-cent rate on dry wine was reduced to 4 cents, and the total tax on sweet wine, including the brandy used in fortification, as against 23 cents, was reduced to 13 by the conferees.

Now, bear in mind, that in 1914 the tax on sweet wines was 23 cents; in 1916 the tax was 13 cents. In 1914 the revenue raised was $2,805,000; and under the reduced schedule, almost one-half reduction, in 1916, the revenue raised was almost twice as much, namely, $5,500,000.

There we have a case where, with a reduction of the tax, there was an increase of revenue; and that is the very contention which I make now, that you will destroy the source if you insist upon the tax. If you let the House rate stand that result will not follow. The House seems to be wiser than the Senate in this respect. Just as it has been endowed by the Constitution with the initiation of revenue legislation, it seems to give, through its committees, a much closer consideration over a longer period of time, without hurry, to these maters; and I think the learned chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House is a very well-informed man on this subject.

Before the amendment of the 1914 law it was claimed that it would produce $7,000,000 of revenue. As I have shown you, less than half that amount was produced. Instead of providing the revenue estimated, the 1914 tax during its operation was fast destroying the wine industry, with cumulative effect, as shown by the continuing diminution of tax receipts. The following figures are taken from the Treasury Department reports:

First 12 months of the law of 1914, $3,444,000.

Last 12 months, $2,805,000.

And in spite of the continuing decrease of revenue during 1915–16 California reports show that the crop was normal, and that the Viticultural Commission of California—which is a body organized by the State, a public commission, not a private commission—reports that about 100,000 tons of grapes were left on the vines to rot, the growers refusing to harvest a crop that had no market.

When the tax forbids the manufacture of grapes into wine, ultimately the grapes will be destroyed. The vines will be uprooted. If the vines were grown in fertile valleys that might not be so great a hardship, because they could substitute a crop which would be more productive in these days of high prices. But the vines are grown upon waste land, rocky soil, on the hillsides. Hillside lands are better for vines than anything else, and good for nothing else; so you see how far-reaching would be the effect of destroying the vine industry.

During the period of transition the grapes would be fed to hogs. It has been demonstrated that the grapes have very little food value as such, so even the hogs and the abattoirs would not profit by it. But the great raisin industry, producing between six and seven million dollars of crop in one or two counties of California, Fresno County particularly, are in great alarm now, as they were when we discussed this question before, because the easy and convenient thing for the vine grower to do when his grapes have no market for the purpose of manufacturing wine is to convert them into raisins. "Well," you may say, "let him convert them into raisins." But there are such things as wine grapes and table grapes and sweet-wine grapes and raisin grapes; and you can not make wine out of any of these varieties, but only the true wine varieties. You can not make raisins out of any variety but only the true raisin variety. So the raisin makers know that with these grapes unused for wine making converted into raisins by the natural drying process, the standard which they have built up for California raisins will be broken down, the market will be flooded, and the prices will be so reduced as ultimately to destroy the raisin industry itself.

So many evils follow in the train of a mistake of this kind if the mistake be made. So it is not the wine industry alone which is concerned, but it is the raisin industry, an industry of which America is proud. I do not know that anywhere outside of California are raisins made by drying them in the open air, which gives them, possibly, their quality, because during the period of June to October there is no rainfall, and our prunes and our raisins are dried, as our other fruits are dried, in the open air; and that has given them, through the industry and enterprise and intelligence of our people, a high place in the market of the world, which redounds ultimately to the sum total of the Nation's wealth. So you can not destroy an industry without inflicting an injury upon the whole people and the pride and commercial glory of our Nation.

On page 7 of Bulletin No. 6, issued by the State Viticultural Commission of California, appears the following:

"The production of sweet wine in the State fell off enormously, due to the prohibitive tax levied by the Federal Government in its emergency revenue act of October 22, 1914. The sweet-wine makers during the vintage of 1915 made little more than one-fifth of a normal production. Four-fifths of the usual amount made each year was sacrificed because of inability of the manufacturer to finance the excessive tax."

To be exact, the decreased production of sweet wine in California on account of the law of 1914 was 12,584,972.24 gallons. On page 9 of Bulletin No. 6 is the following:

"This is a dropping off in normal value of sweet-wine production of about $4,000,000, and, as stated heretofore, the shortage was occasioned by the operation of the Federal emergency act, taxing sweet wines in manufacture at an exorbitant figure."

On page 9 of the report of the State Board of Viticultural Commissioners of December 1, 1916, appears:

"During the preceding season, during which operations were necessarily under the exorbitant Federal tax, the production of sweet wine in California fell off nearly 80 per cent, and it proved to be one of the worst seasons ever experienced by the wine-grape growers of California. Manufacturers could not afford to buy their grapes, and the culls of the raisin and table grapes also went begging."

The damage done to California by the wine tax of 1914 was more than double the total wine production in the United States outside of California—

Outside of California the States of New York, Ohio, Missouri, Michigan, and North Carolina, until it was condemned to a state of dryness, are interested in this question just in proportion to their acreage. California has 350,000 acres in vines, and I will say, in round numbers, Ohio 12,000 acres, Missouri 5,000 acres, New York very much larger. I should say about forty or fifty thousand acres. So these other States are just in proportion to their acreage interested in this question, and doubtless their representatives will be heard from.

As soon as the lower tax rates of 1916 went into effect an immediate increase in revenue was produced, in excess even of the conservative estimates officially submitted by California growers.

It is obvious from the figures at hand that approximately $5,000,000 to $5,500,000 will be collected under present tax, as against $3,444,598.03 under double these rates. The following comparative statement was submitted by the Treasury Department, under date of April 20, 1917:

Act Oct. 22, 1914.

September	$178,086.48
October	198,655.77
November	245,879.96
December	597,392.24
1916:
January	220,848.58
February	193,953.44
March	223,657.71
Total	1,658,474.18

Act Sept. 8, 1916.

September	562,552.22
October	541,128.29
November	549,923.09
December	597,033.78
1917:
January	425,327.26
February	399,371.55
March (not including receipts in first district of California)	278,674.29
Total	3,354,010.48

There is a total in 1915, with the higher rate, of $1,658,000, and in 1916, with the reduced rate, month by month, it is shown here from the official records, of $3,354,000. I do not know that a more conclusive argument from figures could possibly be made. It is only the mistaken zeal of our Finance Committee that has led them to increase the tax. In explanation it was stated to me by a member of the committee that inasmuch as whisky is barred from manufacture there will be an increased demand for wine, and whereas you are getting 35 cents a gallon upon your wine now the wine drinkers will pay a higher price. I wish I could believe it, because in that way California could contribute more revenue to the national defense. But everybody knows that the whisky drinker is not a wine drinker. Wine is distasteful to the whisky drinker, and when he can not get whisky he will not drink wine. There is no resemblance between the beverages. Whisky contains a very large amount of alcohol in a form pleasant to his palate, and he has become inured to that pleasant titillation of his palate, due to the high alcoholic content which he can not find in wine. It would be a great public benefit if the whisky drinker could gradually be weaned from his bottle and led to drink a beverage which while mildly exhilarating is not seriously intoxicating.

Now, this wine problem will be solved apart from the revenue under the direction of the Food Director. The President is invested with the power of barring even the manufacture of wine if it interferes in his judgment with the production of our food supply. Of course he will not act, because wine making does not affect the food supply at all. But he is also empowered under the same act to determine the alcoholic contents of wine. The President therefore has control of the situation, which should mollify those who are in favor of any form of legislation leading toward prohibition. But that question has been settled. So the only question before us is the question of revenue.

On August 15 of this year there was a meeting of all the wine makers of California at the town of Lodi. I am in receipt of this telegram coming from that assemblage, signed by the California Grape Protective Association, Frank T. Sweet, president:

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., August 15, 1917.

Hon. JAMES D. PHELAN,
Washington, D. C.:

Grape growers in mass meeting assembled at Lodi on Saturday passed resolution thanking California delegation for their efforts to preserve the grape industry of California and express the hope that the California delegation would do everything in their power to defeat a prohibitive war tax. We understand that the Senate Finance Committee has recommended increasing the House rate by 2 cents per gallon more on dry wines, $1.10 a proof gallon as a gallonage tax on sweet wine, and the fortifying tax of $1 per proof gallon on brandy used in fortifying. This will kill the sweet-wine industry and kill Government revenue from that source.

CALIFORNIA GRAPE PROTECTIVE ASSOCIATION,
FRANK T. SWEET, President.

Remember, the House has proposed doubling the present rates in the hope of doubling the revenue, and we are willing to try it.

I am confident that this is a sound judgment from men who know their business. The Senate schedule will kill the industry. I think I have demonstrated to you in what has occurred since the emergency war tax of 1914 and the reduced rate of the following year that the revenue has been greatly increased by allowing the lower rate to prevail. I wish the Finance Committee could understand it. It seems paradoxical to say that by giving a lower rate on this commodity you increase the revenue for the Government. It is because with a higher rate they will not produce anything at all. They will go out of business.

The reason is perfectly obvious, but to get the reason into the mind of our revenue makers is the purpose of this discussion. I know they gave but inadequate consideration to this subject. I myself and the Representative from the wine district, CLARENCE F. LEA, filed a brief because the hearings were crowded with men of steel and iron and cigars and tobacco and everything else which the universal bill embraces to the exclusion of calm deliberation. They so crowded the room that I wondered how the gentlemen of the Finance Committee were endowed with the extraordinary capacity of taking in these multifarious subjects and deciding them with fairness and accuracy.

And still the wonder grew
That one small head could carry all they knew.

But my wonderment has been overcome by my disappointment. As a matter of fact, they did not understand the situation at all. If the Senate does not give this relief, I shall have to go again to the conference, as I did the year before, and thus save revenue for the Government. I claim to have saved $2,000,000 revenue to the Government by my insistence in the conference to consider the claim that the lower the rates the higher the revenue, which has been borne out by the facts. I can not go any further.

Therefore I would move, Mr. President, that the House rate be restored to the wine schedule.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that a motion of that kind would be out of order for this reason: The way to accomplish that is to vote down the Senate committee amendment. That is the only way it can be accomplished under the rule.

Mr. PHELAN. My remarks are addressed in opposition to the Senate committee amendment, and if it is voted down, it would be time then to restore the House rate, or would the House rate prevail?

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senate committee amendment is voted down, then the House rate would prevail.

Mr. PHELAN. Before concluding, I desire to ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD an article by Dr. Baruch, of New York, father of Hon. Bernard Baruch, on the question of alcohol, and a letter from Arthur Brisbane.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of California in the chair). If there is no objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE WASHINGTON TIMES,
Washington, D. C., July 28, 1917.

MY DEAR SENATOR PHELAN: I hope the Senate will find a way to get rid of whisky, which is a poison, and not make whisky the national drink by forbidding the use of the light and harmless stimulants.

Your State, of course, is greatly interested in grape growing. The vineyards of the United States should do for the population, for its health, prosperity, and happiness, what the vineyards of France have done for France, what the Italian vineyards did for Italy 2,000 years ago, and what the Greek vineyards did before.

I hope the Senators will compare Greece, Rome, Italy, and France with China and other Asiatic countries, and American prohibition neighborhoods, before they decide to see how much they can make this country like Asia, and unlike those parts of the world in which there has been progress.

I hope that you will demand from the Senate an amendment to the proposed constitutional amendment, limiting this control of the people to the abolition of whisky and retaining the light beer that is needed by the workingmen, and the light wines that are a normal and healthful food of educated men.

Yours, sincerely,

A. BRISBANE.

NEW YORK, June 30, 1917.

HON. J. D. PHELAN,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: As president of a national association for promoting hygiene and as a physician interested for over 50 years in welfare movements—confirmation of which may be obtained from my son, Mr. Bernard M. Baruch—I ask your attention to the following facts:

If you are not interested in the temperance aspect, please read only from page 3 (II). As an ardent temperance advocate, I would hail with joy the removal of the alcohol curse. I favor the prevention by law of the manufacture, importation, and sale of distilled alcohol or its preparations, except for industrial purposes. Even in medicine alcohol is not needed, except in the preparation of drugs. Nevertheless I am opposed to the present antagonism of beer and wine, because I believe that if the saloon, café, and home could not be supplied with distilled beverages, fermented drinks would replace the latter. The curse of alcohol would thus be abolished. The saloon would, indeed, become the "workingman's club," where he and his family would find harmless refreshment. This has actually been achieved in Germany, where custom has made beer the dominant beverage, and in Denmark where places in which beer of 2¼ per cent alcohol is sold to the exclusion of spirituous drinks, are called "Afholdjen" (temperance homes).

You are aware that during the latter half of the last century the temperance movement was on the eve of victory, one-half of the States having passed prohibition laws which were repealed in from 1 to 12 years. This failure was due chiefly to the intolerance and unreasonable attitude of the temperance advocates. During the past decade the more enlightened view that abolition of alcohol was not only an ethical but also an economic necessity has prevailed. We are again on the eve of victory, but I apprehend that the intolerance of prohibitionists, manifested in sincere but unwise insistance upon total abolition of alcoholic drinks, will again bring disaster upon this beneficent cause. Again, unreasoning partisanship is rampant. My rejoicing in the prospect of passing the House bill is sadly tempered by the thought that the inclusion of wine and beer in the House bill will bring about a reaction after the war that will again be disastrous to the cause. Prohibitionists are losing sight of the fact that the passage of this bill will only decrease without preventing the use of alcoholics; the latter will be dearer, and therefore only less accessible to some people. Not only is there a three years' supply on hand, but the House bill, being a food-conservation measure, does not prohibit the importation and sale of intoxicants. Already the dealers are gathering up all stocks of the latter within reach. The temperance movement will therefore not be furthered any more than it was by high licenses. The rich will continue to drink brandy, whisky, etc., while others will turn to these intoxicants, spending far more for them and be damaged in efficiency. In view of these facts, it would appear unwise, if not criminally negligent, from the temperance standpoint to forbid the use of foodstuffs for brewing beer. The experience of Denmark shows a marked diminution in consumption of spirituous liquors (22 per cent) and increase of light beer (13 per cent) since the "Afholdjen" idea has become so popular that even schoolhouses are used for this purpose in the evenings, showing that the decent beer resort will promote temperance. Unfortunately, we can not divest ourselves of the idea which is, alas, but too correct, that the beer saloon is a source of drunkenness, vice, and immorality. But it is obvious that if distilled alcoholics could be eliminated from the saloon it would lose this justly deserved stigma. The ethical prohibitionists may not be able to reconcile themselves to this idea, but the more catholic temperance advocates who regard the curse of drink as a menace to national efficiency realize that the small percentage of alcohol in beer precludes serious encroachment upon the earning capacity of the toilers. As a recent illustration, let me mention that I have seen workmen who had beer with their luncheon shortly afterwards pitching and catching red-hot rivets to repair the elevated tracks. Recent experiments, on the contrary, on the diminution of efficiency produced by alcohol have shown loss of marksmanship in French soldiers who had been given a small drink (three tablespoonfuls) of brandy, the equivalent of about 10 ounces of beer.

II. From the food-conservation standpoint the legal forbidding of barley for brewing is unwise because (a) barley, not being a popular food, farmers will plant it only to export it to other countries where it would fetch a large price for use in malting; (b) that beer has by custom and habit become an imperative need of hard-working people is demonstrated by the fact the British minister of agriculture has recently confirmed the reluctant view of the minister of munition to the effect that the working people demand beer so insistently that the embargo has been considerably modified in their country. To the toilers beer is, indeed, food and drink combined as unprejudiced physiologists agree. I am aware of no proof that efficiency has been notably diminished by its consumption; (c) whether barley and other cereals would be more useful as human food than for brewing has been discussed by chemists whose differences in their estimates of food values recovered after brewing range from 27 per cent to 90 per cent. I regard the latter as correct. "When doctors disagree who shall decide?" Of course, experience must decide, and we have the most reliable guide in the persent experience of the German people. When, in 1915, England threatened the Germans with starvation by its strict blockade, they went to work methodically to avoid defeat from this cause. Their scientists labored on the conservation of food supplies, their cooks and housewives on saving waste, etc. The most important work which appeared at that time was "Die Deutsche Volksernaehrung und der Englische Aushungersplan," by Paul Elzbacher, who gathered the views of the world's greatest food experts, among them Zuntz and Rubner, at whose feet our best food experts have sat years ago. The plan of food conservation evolved by these men to meet the threatened starvation of their people merits strict imitation, although our danger is not so imminent. [Access has been obtained to their views through the writings of a Danish chemist, Dr. Sorensen, who details and confirms their experiments. Sorensen writes: "A small loss is suffered when barley is used in the brewing industry and a larger loss when the same is used for feeding animals. In this fact there is nothing remarkable. * * * At first glance it may seem surprising that a utilization of the barley in the brewing industry causes such a relatively small loss of nutritive value. The reason may be looked for in the usual defective knowledge regarding the large content of nutritive matter in products of the brewery * * *."] The views presented correspond perfectly with the proposals made by Elzbacher and his assistants in the above-mentioned book at the beginning of 1915, which treats in detail the question in what way Germany may in the most rational manner save the foodstuffs on hand and also provide a further supply. The German scientists recommend diminution of the stock of cattle, especially a reduction of the feeding of pigs, and they close the discussion of the brewing industry with the following words: "The amount of nutritive matter at our disposal is not reduced to any extent through the brewing industry, while furthermore the nutritive value of the beer is due not only to its alcoholic content, but also to its other nutritive matter of high value. The present situation does not call for a reduction of the brewing industry." [Sorensen concludes: "While only malt is used in the example borrowed from the German brewing industry, here in Denmark unmalted grains are used in conjunction with the malt. This reduces still more the loss of nutritive matter in brewing."]

Here we have a plain guide for successful food conservation which removes all doubt regarding the unwisdom of forbidding the use of barley and other grains for brewing.

[In contributions to the Medical Record of the 9th and 16th of June, I pointed out why the Germans have so successfully met the menace of starvation up to this time. The scientific methods there referred to may be of great value to our authorities who have, so far as I know, not utilized them.]

The above data show that both from the temperance and food-conservation standpoint the House bill is unwisely against beer.

Not being interested in beer drinking or brewing, I have not dwelt upon other obvious objections to the threatened beer embargo (via the food menace).

Very truly, yours, S. BARUCH, M. D.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I desire to offer now a Senate resolution, which I shall ask to have go over under the rule, and which I give notice that at an early date I expect to ask the Senate to pass. After it is read I just want to say a word or two about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 119), as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, requested and directed, if not incompatible with the public interest, to furnish to the Senate the following information:

First. Whether or not, since the passage of the so-called espionage law, any newspapers, magazines, or other publications have been excluded from the mails or denied second-class mail-matter privileges under the provisions of said act or otherwise.

Second. If so, the names and post-offices of entry of such publications.

Third. The particular provisions of the law which the department claims to have been violated by such publications.

Fourth. In what matter, specifically and particularly, the department claims such law has been violated by such publications, and by each of them.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, with reference to this resolution I desire to make a brief statement at present and at an early day I expect to ask the Senate to pass it.

I wish to instance one case that has recently occurred in which it seems to me that the position of the department is thoroughly indefensible. There is a publication in New York called The Masses, a magazine almost revolutionary in its type and in its sentiment. I am not prepared to either indorse or condemn many of the things that publication contains, but at the same time I want to direct the attention of the Senate, in this perliminary way, to what has happened in respect to that publication.

Within the last few months that publication carried four cartoons representing its views on the pending public questions of gravest importance and moment. It had three or four articles with respect to its views on those same questions, one particularly assailing the President of the United States for his inconsistency in respect to certain views which he now entertains and certain positions that he now occupies, and comparing previous utterances of the President with his present utterances and his present positions.

On that account and for that reason, acting under certain provisions of the espionage law which it was alleged were applicable to the case, the Post Office Department denied this publication the use of the mails, and denied it entry as second-class mail matter. The publisher sued out a mandatory injunction before the United States judge of the southern district of New York. That injunction came on to be heard and the presiding judge decided that without reference to the merits or demerits of the views and cartoons as contained in this publication they were merely the free expression of opinion as to governmental policy, and that as long as this remained a free country and its citizens continued to possess the right of free speech no one had the right to deny the right of this publication to express these views even if they did not concur therein.

Therefore the court issued a mandatory injunction against the Post Office Department. Following that decision the Government appealed to the circuit judge of that circuit, presiding in Vermont, and that judge, I think his name was Judge Hough, under a provision of the judicial code authorizing it, suspended the operation of the mandatory injunction, pendente lite.

Of course, that is just the history of what happened in a preliminary way. But now comes the remarkable part of it. Since all that has happened the Post Office Department has issued an order suspending the use of the mails as second-class mail to this publication because it has not been issued and published regularly. In other words, the Post Office Department, among other things—it may have other contentions, but this seems to be the principal one—first denied the use of the mails to this publication and finally, when held up in the courts with the only decision that has been so far had against them, turned to another provision of law and said to the publisher, "Well, you can not continue to use the mails because you have not been going regularly through the mails at the time you were prevented from doing so by our order." If that is not taking advantage of your own wrong I do not know how else to put it. It seems to me that is too arbitrary a proceeding to be countenanced in this country of free speech.

Mr. KNOX. I should like to have the Senator from Georgia restate the position taken by the Post Office Department. I did not quite catch it.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Post Office Department has now excluded The Masses—that is the name of the publication—from the mails and denied it second-class privileges because it said during the recent months, while this litigation was pending, it had not been going regularly through the mails, and they fall back on another provision of the law which denies second-class privileges to publications that do not issue regularly and go through the mails regularly, although the only reason The Masses has not issued regularly, and has not gone through the mails regularly, is because the Post Office Department would not let it do it.

Mr. President, I am not excited about this matter. Personally I have a very warm regard for the Postmaster General. A friendship of years that I prize very highly exists between us.

I do not know to what extent he has had anything to do with this matter or even if he knows exactly what has been done, but if this is to remain the land of the free and if freedom of the press and freedom of speech are not to become mockeries in this Republic the Senate of the United States or the Congress of the United States can not afford to countenance any such proceeding as this or fail to condemn it.

So I say at the proper time, as soon as I can do it under the rules, I expect to ask the Senate to call on the Post Office Department for information with respect to these matters so that it may be seen exactly to what extent my information about this mater and matters of a similar kind is accurate. I think my information is accurate, and I have therefore presented this resolution.

Now, I want to say just a word or two in a very general way about this tax bill. In the first place, I am opposed to the plan proposed by the committee for a tax on excess profits. I believe it is unwise, unfair, and unjust. I believe that taxes ought to be levied at all times, and particularly at the present time, with reference, first of all, to the ability of people to pay them and to bear the burden without being ruined; and it does seem to me as though we ought to fix a flat rate and to apply it equally to all business men and to all corporations as great as we care to make it or as those businesses can justly stand and not undertake to set up abitrary standards and rules which in their practical operation work the grossest injustices to many of the great business enterprises of this country, as I believe the Senate committee's plan will do with respect to this particular matter.

Now, let me illustrate. I have no particular interest in them except that they are among my constituents and many of their owners are among my personal friends. I have no pecuniary interest in them whatever; but the illustration I desire to make is in respect to the cotton-mill owners and operators of the State of Georgia. For many years prior to this war they had very lean years—hard years—they made very little money. During the three years that immediately preceded the war many of them had to be reorganized; they went into bankruptcy, passed up their dividends, and in some cases the interest on their bonded debt. They had three of the hardest years, so I am informed, in the whole history of the industry. Since the war—and I do not think directly because of it, although there may be some indirect influence growing out of the increased use and destruction of cotton goods in times of war—their operations have been profitable; they have made money; they have had fat years.

They are willing to pay generously, liberally, whatever rate you think is right on every cent they make, every year; but to apply this excess profits tax to them, and to go back for the purposes of comparison to three of the leanest years in their history and compare those years with three of the most prosperous years they have had works a practical injustice of the grossest kind and character, according to my information, with respect to this particular industry. I am afraid that that may be true with respect to many businesses and industries of this country.

I should much rather see whatever rate of taxation the committee thinks is fair, and that the business of this country can stand without ruin, assessed and levied uniformly on everything, so that everyone will know exactly what he is to pay, than to have any such rule as this established by which to measure this tax. I very much prefer the House provision to the Senate committee's amendment, and I hope the Senate will adopt the House plan, or something like it, rather than the plan proposed by the Senate committee.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BRADY. Does the Senator believe that a horizontal rate should be applied on all excess profits or simply on newspaper publications?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not think—and I am coming to that in a minute—that it ought to be applied to anybody especially; but if it is to be applied, there is no reason why the newspaper publishers of this country should pay a special tax that other business men do not pay. I am going fully to discuss that in just a moment, but, so far as this particular question is concerned, I do not think this excess-profits tax as it is framed here ought to be applied to anybody, whether it be newspaper men or anybody else.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I am always interested in what the Senator says, but let me suggest to him, before he begins the argument he intends to make, that the theory of the bill is not based on excess profits but war profits. The House bill provides for excess profits and then specifies what they consider a normal profit; all above that, of course, is to be taxed. But the Senate committee have taken the position that what they want to tax is war profits.

Mr. HARDWICK. I understand that; and I am glad the Senator has made that contribution to the discussion, but the trouble is when it comes to working it out practically you can not do it. That is the great difficulty—the impracticability of the application of this tax as you propose it.

What are war profits and what are not? Where is the line to be drawn? Where do war profits begin and where do they end? You can take the cotton mills in my State, to pursue the very illustration that I have been giving the Senate, and, I ask, does the Senator say their profits are war profits? I do not think so, and yet there might be room for dispute and debate about that.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want to interrupt the Senator——

Mr. HARDWICK. I am perfectly willing, as the Senator knows, to have him interrupt me. It never bothers me to be interrupted——

Mr. SMOOT. I should be perfectly willing to take up the question of the cotton mills themselves and other businesses that are affected in the same way; but I am afraid it would take too long a time now. I expect to do so, however, and I hope the Senator, when we do undertake to explain the matter, will listen carefully, for if he does I believe that he will come to the conclusion that as to that class of business and every other class of business, we have had in mind only war profits. That is what we intended to reach. Of course, I shall be delighted to hear what the Senator has to say in relation to that, but I only made the suggestion to him because that was the theory the committee had.

Mr. HARDWICK. I understand that, and I appreciate the suggestion of the Senator from Utah. I know that is the theory on which the committee has operated, and yet I say to you that in my judgment—you may change it in debate; my mind is open—it is a theory that is impossible of practical application, without the grossest injustice to many businesses in this country.

I agree with the Senator that we do not want any extended and protracted debate on these questions, and I am only referring to them in a passing way. I agree with the Senator that it is important that we take up these questions, consider them in detail, and see what their effect will be on every kind of business in this country. When that is done I believe that the Senate will arrive at a just conclusion with respect to the matter. The central thought in my mind, however, is—and this is merely one manifestation of where it leads—that it is utterly unwise to so burden and to so hamper American production and American industry and American business of any sort that it can not get along and help to pay and continue to help to pay the burden of the expenses of this great war. To use a very common homely adage, but one that is always apt, it is nonsense to think in this emergency of killing the goose that lays the golden eggs.

I want to impose all the taxes that business can legitimately and properly stand upon every kind of business man; I want to play no favorites, and I do not think the Senate does, with respect to that matter; but I think it would be financial suicide, and worse than financial suicide, for the Government of the United States to adopt a mistaken policy of not only confiscating, as I am afraid some portions of this bill will do, the total income of some of the businesses, but, in some instances, I am afraid, the business themselves.

The cotton mill men in my State contend that in many cases—and they have sent me the specific proof of it—the tax imposed will amount to 81 per cent of all they earn. That is not right; we ought not to do that. The Senate does not want to do that. These men are willing to pay whatever we require them to pay; of course they will submit to the law, no matter how unjust it is; but surely it is not necessary to treat American business along any such harsh lines as that; surely we shall make for the better success of the country and for its enduring prosperity if we treat these men justly and impose on them only a just and reasonable tax, and not one that is unjust and which almost amounts to confiscation.

As to the details of this matter, the Senator from Utah well suggests that we can leave them until the Senate takes up the particular amendment to act on it. Then I will listen with a great deal of interest and with a great desire to know exactly what defense may be made of this proposal and what the Senators on the committee have to submit in support of their proposition. My present view is that the proposition of the House is infinitely preferable to that of the Senate committee.

Now, there is one other thing to which I desire to refer in passing—two other matters, in fact, but one more particularly, to which the Senator from Utah made reference on yesterday and then again a few days preceding. I refer to the drawback on sugar.

Mr. President, it is incomprehensible to me how any Senator of the United States who understands that question can vote to repeal the drawback on sugar. I do not believe he can if he understands it. I do not think there is a Member of this body who, with an understanding of the facts involved in that proposition, could possibly support it.

Now, let me lay down just one or two propositions, in a preliminary way, about that. If the drawback on sugar is to be repealed, and if we are honest men and are dealing impartially and squarely and justly with all the interests of this country, we will repeal every other drawback provision. There is no reason for the one that does not exist in every other case. If we are to desert and abandon the policy of paying drawbacks on raw materials imported into this country for manufacture and reexportation, then we ought not to do that in just one case, but we ought to do it in every case. I propose, when we arrive at that stage of the proceeding, to submit the proposition to the Senate honestly and candidly to take this policy as a whole and do with it one way or the other on everything just exactly alike. So much for that. No man can defend an exceptional treatment of sugar, with respect to drawbacks. It is entitled to exactly the same treatment that any and every other product is entitled to and to no different treatment. It is not just and fair to discriminate for it or against it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator allow me to make a mild suggestion along that line?

Mr. HARDWICK. I would be delighted to have the Senator do so.

Mr. McCUMBER. So that he can take it into consideration before he arrives at a final conclusion, the suggestion being made for the purpose of making a distinction between different characters of drawbacks or drawbacks upon different commodities.

The Senator indicated that they should all be treated alike. Now, we can easily understand that if Canada has the kind of lumber that we may need in the northern part of the United States for the construction of box cars or flat cars the material might be brought here and the work of building those cars be performed by American workmen and then a rebate allowed upon the lumber when the cars were manufactured and exported; but let me give the Senator an illustration concerning another commodity. Take wheat, for instance. We know what effect the drawback has upon the market value of wheat in the Northern States. It operates in this way: If the amount of wheat the millers are required to have on hand is getting low at any time and they must therefore bid up the price a little in order to draw the grain from the farmer's granary and to set it moving, they can avoid that by buying wheat in Canada and paying the duty on it, which will drive down the price of the American wheat, and then they can export so much, not the very flour made from the wheat imported from Canada but an equivalent of the imported wheat—and they are all exporters—and they may then take the amount of the duty paid from the Treasury of the United States. By manipulating the drawback provision they can manipulate the market, driving it up or driving it down. That is one of the dangers that we incur by reason of the drawback in the North; and I gather from the argument made by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] that the drawback provision on sugar is used in the same way by the refiners. I think this situation is worthy of consideration and that the market should be studied to see for what purpose the drawback is used.

Mr. HARDWICK. Let me suggest to the Senator that whatever may be true as to the wheat question with respect to the territory immediately adjacent to the Canadian border, along the lines of his suggestion, there is not even the slightest possibility that such a thing may be true with reference to the sugar situation; and when we come to this provision I think I can demonstrate it to a mathematical certainty and to the satisfaction of every Senator in this Chamber, with the possible exception of the two Senators from Louisiana. I do not know whether they will agree or not.

This drawback question is not a new one. The Senator from North Dakota has indicated that he has some views that arise out of a local situation with respect to wheat. Those views can not possibly pertain to the sugar that we bring in from Cuba. We refined for reexportation abroad last year something like 750,000 tons of sugar. I will ask the Senator from Utah if that is not right?

Mr. SMOOT. We exported 700,000 tons last year and will export a million tons this year.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator says 700,000 tons, so we are pretty close together; I thought the amount was about three-quarters of a million tons, but it is infinitesimal compared to the total consumption of sugar in this country. It has no possible relation, considered alone, to the price in this country; but, as the Senator from Utah has accurately and truly said—and no man in this Chamber knows better than I do, because I have had occasion to study this one question, and it is one question connected with the tariff upon which I do claim to have expert knowledge—undoubtedly, if we are to force England and all the other allied countries, with their present lack of preparation to do it, to refine the sugar that they must buy under present conditions from Cuba, we are forcing up the world's price, and in forcing up the world's price we force up the American consumers' price. So, instead of the contention being sound that was advanced on this floor yesterday by my friend the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD], that his fight is a fight in the interest of the American consumer of sugar, I tell the Senate absolutely that the exact reverse, in my opinion, is true.

The Senator from Utah accurately pointed out that since the agitation of this question and that since the action of the committee the world's price of sugar has risen a half a cent a pound, and every American consumer has also had to pay that half a cent a pound just as all the world is paying it.

Now, small as our sugar exports are, when compared to our total consumption, the fact that we have the equipment and the factories and the refineries here is helping to hold down the price abroad. It would be hard-hearted to a degree that I can not understand for anybody, in the interest of cane sugar or beet sugar, to say that at this moment under the circumstances confronting the world we should take our allies—not our allies, because we have no treaties with them, but the nations which are engaged with us in the common undertaking of fighting the German Empire—by the throat and literally hold them up. I say it is incomprehensible to me that any man could really think that, or urge it seriously, and I am sure the Senate will never agree to such a proposition.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to suggest at this point to the Senator from North Dakota that there is quite a difference between the drawback provision applying to sugar and that applying to wheat for this reason: We are not exporters of sugar; we have to import into this country more than half of the sugar that is consumed by the people of the United States; but we are exporters of wheat. The advantage suggested as being taken by some of the millers of the country of the drawback provisions is only possible in connection with commodities of which we are exporters. I have no doubt that the condition of affairs suggested by the Senator from North Dakota has prevailed; but it is impossible to happen in the case of sugar, because we are not exporters of sugar.

Mr. HARDWICK. Exactly; not to amount to anything, when compared with our total consumption. I am not going any further into that matter, except I am going to characterize this proposition. It is a proposal to reverse the settled practice of this country with respect to a great legislative policy in one particular commodity, leaving it unchanged as to every other commodity embraced within the policy. It is a proposal no more nor less than to tax the necessities of the whole civilized world in order that a few people who are already reaping profits beyond the dreams of avarice shall get a few pennies more for their products. That is what it amounts to, and that is what it is.

Mr. President, there are one or two other matters to which I wish to invite attention in a way—and briefly at that—before we come to their consideration in the bill. They are postal matters; and I think I may say with accuracy that in the position I take with respect to these matters I occupy the somewhat unusual position of representing the views of the administration and the Post Office Department. I am willing to side with the administration when I think it is right, and it is a matter of very great regret to me that I can not think it is right a little more frequently. But about these matters, upon which there are some differences between the committee that reported this bill and the Post Office Department, I am in hearty accord and sympathy with the views of the Post Office Department; and I mention that now so that the Senate may understand what is coming when we reach these sections.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. Do I understand the Senator as stating that the Post Office Department favors the House bill zone system?

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, no; I have not said that. I said I was going to state certain positions which the Post Office Department favored.

Mr. SIMMONS. I thought that was the Senator's statement.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; that is not the position of the Post Office Department.

First, in its effort to equalize the stamp tax which it has put on express companies, the committee has recommended the imposition of what it thought was a similar stamp tax on the parcel-post business of the Government. I understand that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] will submit at a later stage of the proceedings an amendment which will really equalize it; and I am not going to take advantage of the mistake—which, of course, in the pressure of other business was probably natural and inevitable—that was made with respect to that. Of course, as the proposition was presented to the Senate and is carried in the text of the bill, it did not accomplish what the committee really aimed to do, and it is perfectly proper that it shall be changed; and, as I suggested to the Senate the other day, the way to change it so as to make it exactly equalize the other proposal, the express-company stamp tax, is to make your charge on Government parcel-post matter not applicable except where the postal charges are as much as 25 cents, and then to impose the same stamp tax for each fractional part of each additional 25 cents, as you have done with the express company. But, of course, if it were left so that this 1-cent tax is put on the little packages, even where they weigh over 4 ounces, in some cases the increase in parcel-post rates would have gone to 22 per cent, which, of course, the committee never had in mind, and would not itself support.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that that came about—and I know that he knows it, but perhaps some of the other Senators do not know it—in this way: The express companies of the country do not send out packages at a less charge than 25 cents.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; not parcels.

Mr. SMOOT. Parcels, I should say.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, the Senator said "packages." That is the same thing.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is true. So that the committee proposes to change that; but I shall propose to strike it out, and I shall propose to strike it out because it is an entirely different thing from the express-company tax.

Here is a function performed by the Government of the United States. If there is any profit in it at all, every cent of it goes into the Government Treasury, into the funds of the Postal Department, to pay first, of course, the postal expenses of this country, and then the excess, if any, to go into the general funds of the Treasury. So that we are proposing to tax a rather anomalous subject, I think—the Government itself. We are proposing to tax a function that is exercised by the Government itself, and to take out of the citizen more money without increasing the rate for a public governmental service. What we ought to do, if these rates are not high enough, or if we want to increase them, is to increase the rates, and not resort to the rather unusual and somewhat ludicrous performance of taxing our own Government as it goes out to do business among the people.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, does not the Senator think that the wording of the amendment eliminates the conclusion reached by the Senator when the committee uses the words "to be paid by the consignor"? In other words, the committee says specifically who shall pay this tax.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is true enough; I was not unmindful of that; but, after all, you are taxing a Government service. You are requiring that the man who uses it shall pay it, but you take the rates that are fixed by law for the use of this Government service and you say, "Before you shall take advantage of the rate fixed by law you shall pay an extra tax on the carriage."

Now, I do not think that is the way to treat the Government. If there is any profit in this thing at all—and there is about ten millions a year profit, in round figures, on this Post Office parcel-post business—every cent of it goes to the Government, every penny of it. If you want to raise the rate, why, raise it; but it is rather a new thing, and I think rather an unsafe thing, to undertake to tax a governmental function itself.

Now, let us see. There are one or two other postal matters to which I want to refer very briefly.

In this bill you have proposed to increase the rate on first-class mail matter. You propose to increase letter postage from 2 cents for an ounce or fraction thereof to 3 cents for an ounce or fraction thereof, and you propose to leave the post card like it is, 1 cent. The House, in raising the letter charge, wisely, I think, raised the post card charge, too. It looks to me like it is necessary to raise them both, because if you do not, according to the opinion of the Post Office Department, you will so largely change the character of the mail that millions and possibly hundreds of millions of communications that are now sent by letter will be sent by post card where the charge is 3 cents in one case and 1 cent in the other, and instead of increasing the postal revenues at all there is serious doubt if you will not reduce the revenues in your attempt to raise the rates of letter postage.

I want you to consider that. It is worthy of consideration. My own belief is—and I merely express it as an opinion—that we probably will not get $1,000,000 a year more revenue from first-class mail matter under your proposition than we do under existing law. Even if we did, however, and even if we could rely on the figures given in your report, I shall contend that it is a manifest wrong to the people of this country to increase the rates on first-class mail matter.

First-class mail matter is already paying into the Treasury of the United States—the postal treasury, I mean—a net profit of about $80,000,000 a year, in round figures. Second-class mail matter is losing, every year, just about the same sum.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KELLOGG. May I ask the Senator from Georgia where he gets the figures that second-class mail matter is now losing $80,000,000 a year?

Mr. HARDWICK. From the Hughes commission, from the Post Office Department, from every commission that has ever investigated the question, from the Postmaster General, from the First Assistant Postmaster General, from the special agent, Mr. Sewart, and from every department official who has ever had to do with this question or who has ever made a report on it.

Mr. KELLOGG. I think the Senator will find that the figures of $80,000,000 a year were based upon the statement of the Postmaster General that the transportation of second-class matter cost 9 cents, while the Hughes Commission found that it cost only 5½ cents. Furthermore, the report of the Hughes Commission was made almost 10 years ago, when the total amount of first-class mail was 157,000,000 pounds, while it is now 315,000,000 pounds, and when the amount of second-class mail was less than half what it is to-day.

Mr. HARDWICK. That does not make any difference. The figures can be applied to any volume of business.

Mr. KELLOGG. The cost per pound decreases as the number of pounds increases.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, that is a rule of traffic, and that, of course, is true.

Mr. KELLOGG. Well, that is a fact. It is not a rule of traffic, but it is a fact.

Mr. HARDWICK. It is a rule of traffic. I object to the Senator saying it is not a rule of traffic, because it is a rule of traffic. That is exactly what it is. Of course, that is a fact, too; but it is both, instead of being just one, and not the other.

The same principle applies to first-class mail, too, for that matter. It applies to anything transported in this country, either freight or passenger service, in my judgment. But let us see.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KELLOGG. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that I think he will find, on an examination of the figures, that that estimate was not based on any figures of the carrying of second-class matter at this time, nor on any credible estimate.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I am glad to inform the Senator that the exact reverse of that statement is true; and I get my authority for the assertion from the Postmaster General, who has had many experts at work for years on this question, and who has not simply some brief sent him by some publisher who has some special interest to serve in this matter, and who has not some personal or political interest to subserve in the matter at all, but is absolutely impartial about this matter.

Now, if the Senator please, let me tell him something: He has not studied this question. Now, that is right. He has not—I want to be frank with him—and I have, for 10 years, night and day. I have been to the bottom of every one of these reports. I have had the benefit of all the expert assistance the Post Office Department can give on this question, and I believe the estimate of the Postmaster General is strictly within the limits of accuracy and truth on this question. He has no motive except to serve the Government of the United States. He has no newspaper to bootlick in this matter. He has no personal or selfish interest to subserve. He is trying to do justice by the Government, and discharge a great trust which has been imposed upon him; and I will tell my friend from Minnesota, with all respect to him, that it would pay him to listen to the showing that the Post Office Department will make on this question, and not to take a snap judgment about this matter, and not to get his own opinion made up that what he has read there from something is not the fact.

Now, going on for just a minute, I am opposed to any increase in the postal rate on first-class mail matter. I doubt if the increase you have suggested will increase the Government revenue one penny; but even if it did, I would be opposed to it still, because the common people of this country, who are paying a net profit of $80,000,000 a year from their letter postage into the postal treasury, ought not to be further taxed until you have made other people who have special privileges and special graft in connection with this matter pay what it costs the Government to render the service that they get from the Government.

That is what we ought to do. We ought to make these people pay what it costs to render them the service we do render them out of the common Treasury and out of the public funds of this country; and until we do that no Senator in this body will have any excuse for proposing a higher tax on the common, unorganized masses of his constituency who have no newspapers to brag on him or to abuse him, according to what his conduct is with respect to this matter.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. As a business proposition, nobody can deny what the Senator has just stated. I, too, have given this question considerable attention, and I think the figures quoted by the Senator are well within the bounds of accuracy.

Mr. HARDWICK. They are.

Mr. SMOOT. But I want to ask the Senator what he would suggest when he takes into consideration the fact that the imposition of such a tax in this bill would virtually destroy the magazines and many publications that have been enjoying this bounty and privilege for so many years? The Senator perhaps noticed the other day, in some passing remarks, that I called particular attention to the farm journals and to the religious papers and different publications of the country.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I have gone into that question enough to know that if we did impose this rate they could not live. What has the Senator thought in his mind and decided as to what is the best policy to pursue?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, for my information, the Senator from Utah used the expression, "if we impose this rate." To what rate does he refer?

Mr. SMOOT. The rate necessary to take care of the losses that are now sustained by the Government of the United States on second-class mail matter.

Mr. POMERENE. The entire loss?

Mr. HARDWICK. We can not do that entirely. I will answer the Senator as briefly as I can, and in answering him I will give the plan which I have offered here, which is the plan of the Post Office Department. It is not mine at all.

The Post Office Department has, I think, suggested the proper solution of this matter; and the solution that it has suggested, I want to state to the Senator, would not hurt any one of the papers of the character he has indicated. They have agreed to it, the majority of them—the religious publications—because the plan of the zone system would hurt them very badly. They could not live under that plan, I admit; but the plan that the Post Office Department will offer to the Senate will not injure any of those papers, and they all, as far as I know, or nearly all of them, at least—all that we have heard from—think it is the just plan for Congress to adopt.

What is that plan? I do not want to go into it too much in detail now, because I am taking up vastly more time than I intended; but that plan is twofold. We have realized that the fundamental and basic principle on which this service rests, and upon which its rates are fixed, is that there shall be a very nominal rate for the transportation and diffusion of intelligence throughout the country. It is necessary in a free country, if democratic institutions are to be maintained and preserved, that that policy shall be followed; so that we do not propose to change the rate of 1 cent per ounce on reading matter, on editorial matter, or on matter of any other sort, except on advertising matter. We propose to leave the purely nominal rate of 1 cent per pound—which is not one-eighth, at least, to state it conservatively, of what it costs—in effect on all of that character of matter that is published in any sort of a paper, magazine, or other publication in this country. But we do say, and we do insist—the Post Office Department does, and I do—that it is right, when it comes to the advertising matter, the purely commercial and business end of every newspaper and magazine enterprise in the country, that they should not get a service from the Government to be paid for out of the Public Treasury at less than one-eighth of what it costs the people of the United States to render it to them. We say, "In the interest of the Government and to carry out the policy that has been recognized here for many years we are willing that all of your reading matter, all of your editorial matter, everything except the purely commercial features of your publication, shall go at this nominal rate of 1 cent; but upon the advertising matter, the commercial part of it, you must pay what it costs us to handle it; otherwise we do not want to continue to handle it." That is fair and that is just, and the Senator knows it.

We can do that by a period of readjustment extending through several years, doubling the rate, maybe, the first year, making it 2 cents, then 4 cents, then 6 cents, and then finally, perhaps, 8 cents on the advertising matter.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Has the Senator introduced an amendment here of that kind?

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, yes. It has been pending here for weeks. The Senator can get it from the desk.

Mr. McKELLAR. How much revenue will be produced under the amendment which the Senator has introduced?

Mr. HARDWICK. In the end, when we get it up to where it ought to be, about $50,000,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. I mean how much does it start with?

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, that is a matter of no concern. I think it doubles it to start on—$22,000,000, maybe, for the first year—but let me say to the Senator from Tennessee that it is of minor importance how much money we get out of this proposition at the present moment.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree with the Senator about that.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes. The proposition is to get this great injustice permanently adjusted, to get this wrong so that it will be righted and stay righted, and so that newspapers can not use their influence with public men in order to maintain a special privilege that they ought not to have, when it comes to the commercial part and the business end of their enterprises, at least.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish the Senator would elucidate the matter a little further and in order that he may do that I wish to ask him a question. In the charges made for the commercial features, the advertising, is the zone system put into operation?

Mr. HARDWICK. No, sir; it is the flat rate.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me ask the Senator does he think it is possible to reach a just result unless some sort of a zone system is adopted?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do. Now, let me say——

Mr. NORRIS. I am not referring now in my question to the flat rate for the educational part of it; I agree with the Senator that we ought to be liberal in that respect; but I, myself, can not understand how if the Government is going to get back the cost for transportation it can do it without taking business into consideration.

Mr. HARDWICK. Of course, the Senator is right in that way; we can only strike averages by adopting the other system, yet there was a tremendous argument why we ought to maintain the same fundamental flat-rate principle that is applicable to every transaction of the Post Office Department except those transactions that are purely and entirely commercial, like the Parcel Post System. For instance, a 2-cent stamp carries a letter to San Francisco just the same as it does to Alexandria, Va.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator yield again?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. We know that argument is always made and in theory I think it is sound. As a matter of fact, however, I do not believe it will work out because, as I understand, the 2-cent proposition is really based on the proposition that the weight of the letter is infinitesimal; that it is so small it is not practical to take into consideration because it would cost more to compute it than it would be worth after it was computed. But in the handling of magazines, where tons are frequently dumped on the Government at once, weight becomes very material, and hence this question becomes very material.

Mr. HARDWICK. I realize the force of the Senator's view along those lines and they have appealed to me, but if you adopt such a system for the transmission of newspapers and magazines and publications, generally, you localize and provincialize the press of the country, you narrow it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. Pardon me just a minute. You do a great deal to build up a provincial feeling and sentiment in this country. All students of political economy agree on this proposition, that one of the first essentials of a real national spirit in a country as big as this is that the press to some extent shall have a national circulation, a national viewpoint, and a national spirit. I am afraid if the proposal of the Senator from Nebraska or the Senator from Tennessee were enacted into law the tendency would be toward provincialism, on the part of the press.

Mr. McKELLAR and Mr. NORRIS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield, and, if so, to whom?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield first to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask the Senator if he does not think, under the present system of distributing news, where a newspaper, for instance, in Atlanta, Ga., prints the same character of cosmopolitan news every morning that each one of the cosmopolitan papers of New York prints, the rule the Senator would seek to lay down would make newspapers provincial? Does not the Senator think he is mistaken in that view?

Mr. HARDWICK. Of course it is the editorial policy of the newspaper only. I have reference to that only.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is only a small part.

Mr. HARDWICK. Although the Senator probably has them more in mind, the newspapers are a small part of the sum total; there are also to be considered the magazines, the great weeklies, the great monthlies that build up national public sentiment in this country. Take the Saturday Evening Post, for instance. The Senator will find that such a publication as that circulates all over this country and every part of it, in every hamlet and every village. I think papers of that character do a great work in building up a national spirit in this country. This is my own view, and I think it is the view of the Post Office Department that any departure from that policy would be a mistake and might tend to provincialize the press of the country, and by the press of the country I mean not only the daily newspapers, but the weeklies and monthlies and other magazines and publications as well.

I now yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me, as far as the newspapers are concerned, they are provincial already to a great extent. After the news gets a day old its competition with another daily paper, of course, is not taken into consideration. So the circulation of dailies, as far as the news is concerned, is necessarily limited geographically already by the very nature of things. I can see how the Senator's argument would apply to great magazines, but when the Senator comes to fix this rate on the advertising part of newspapers and magazines he must necessarily reach some common ground. He must compromise between the long distance and the short distance. The moment he does that he makes the charge exorbitant for a short distance, and would not this be the result? Would it not mean that the Government would make a profit out of the short haul——

Mr. HARDWICK. And lose money on the long haul.

Mr. NORRIS. And lose money on the long haul, and averaging the two up it would come out even? But would not this be the result, that on the short haul, were it commercially possible to make a profit on transporting the newspapers or the magazines, the express companies would do the business, so that the Government would be left the unprofitable part of it and lose the profitable part?

Mr. HARDWICK. No; there is so much discrepancy between express rates and Government rates that that is not possible.

Mr. NORRIS. A great many of the publications go by express now, some two or three hundred miles and some four hundred miles, where they even get a less rate.

Mr. HARDWICK. The question which the Senator has raised is constantly recurring about everything and everywhere. When you make a statute, of course it does not fit everything exactly alike. You can do no more than strike an average, and that it what this proposal does, or attempts to do.

I do not want to discuss it with any greater detail now. I want to conclude and yield the floor, but I do want to say the plan of the Post Office Department is practicable and feasible, without doubt and without any difficulty. It can be done. We can separate the advertisement from the educational and reading matter with a common ordinary rule. All they have to do is to take a rule and measure the amount of advertisement and the amount of nonadvertising matter in every publication and average them for a long enough period, and then you can tell what the per cent of advertising matter is and what the per cent of news, the educational and reading matter, is. That has been done by the Post Office Department on almost every publication of this kind already—daily, weekly, and monthly—and before this debate is over I shall be able to give to the Senate or to any Senator who desires it the exact per cent of advertising matter carried by almost any publication of any importance in this country, and many other important facts related to this matter.

It is a proposition of common justice; it is a proposition of common honesty to your own Government, unless we are willing to be partial to the newspapers, either out of a sense of gratitude for favors they have already bestowed on us or a lively sense of gratitude for favors that are yet to come. I can not think that any Senator will stand and vote against the interests of the people of the United States and of the Treasury of the United States and against the earnest protest of the Post Office Department in this matter, when he understands the facts and knows the truth, and it is going to be my task before this bill is disposed of to present that truth in such a way that no man who wants to know it can fail to do so. Of course I may not be able to measure up to that standard, but if I do not it will be my own fault, because the officers of the Post Office Department have worked the thing out with splendid intelligence and industry, and they know the facts and have furnished them to me, and I shall endeavor to furnish them to the Senate.

Now, one observation and I am through.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I will yield to the Senator, although I want to conclude.

Mr. KELLOGG. If the Senator prefers not to yield, I will wait.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am always willing to yield, unless it is some controversial matter that the Senator wants to present. We will have plenty of time for that later.

One other matter I am going to propose myself unless somebody else proposes it. I believe I saw in the newspapers where the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] had proposed to strike out the special tax on publications. It ought not to be in this bill. Publishers ought to be taxed just like other business men, and not differently. That is right, that is just. But, on the other hand, they ought to have no special privilege, or no special graft, in this Government or in the Post Office Department. As far as their rates are concerned, on every matter that is educational, or that is news, or that is editorial, I am perfectly willing that the present rate shall stand and the established policy of this country be maintained. Since 1885 the development of newspapers and magazines and other publications in this country into great business interests and into great money-making enterprises has been tremendous. There are many kinds of these publications where 75 per cent of all their space is advertisement, and to say that we should carry that sort of stuff through the mails of this country at a loss of seventy to eighty million dollars a year is preposterous. I do not think when the people of this country understand it they are likely to continue to countenance it much longer.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to discuss for a few moments the Senate committee amendment known as section 1101, appearing on page 94 of the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to ask the Senator from Tennessee if he would not be willing to let us vote on the amendment now pending. The Senator from Georgia offered a resolution, which he discussed, and then it led to some general debate on the bill, but the Senate has before it section 310, which relates to wine. The Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] has made a speech upon that amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. And the Senator wants to have a vote upon it?

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask the Senator to let us go on with that question, and let him present his argument on section 1101 when that section is reached.

Mr. McKELLAR. Surely. At what time will it likely be reached? I would prefer to say what I desire to say on the subject to-day. I ask the Senator whether it will be reached to-day or not?

Mr. SIMMONS. We are now acting upon amendments passed over on yesterday, three or four, or probably five or six.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, we are unable to hear the Senator on this side.

Mr. SIMMONS. I said we are now considering the amendments that were passed over by request on yesterday. There are several of those, and the section to which the Senator from Tennessee refers is one of them.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is one of them.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator desires, later I will agree to take that out of its order in order to accommodate him.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well, that will be entirely satisfactory.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, in reply to the observation of the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] with reference to the tax imposed upon wine and grape brandy, I do not propose to make any argument but merely to state a few facts.

Wine is divided into two parts. There is the dry wine, which contains its own alcohol; that is, it is sufficiently fortified without any additional alcohol. On that the committee has simply, following the lead of the House, which increased the present rate by 50 per cent, doubled the rate. Then, there is the sweet wine, a large part of which is grown in California and on the Pacific coast, and another part of it, not quite so large, grown in the States of the Mississippi Valley. It appears that the wines of California can not be very well fortified with grain spirits. There is something in its nature and its quality which requires a different character of fortification. The wines, on the other hand, of the Mississippi Valley are of such a character that they can not well be fortified with anything except grain spirits.

These two kinds of wine are produced in different sections of the country and are sold in competition with each other, one having to be fortified with grape spirits and the other has to be fortified with grain spirits. The taxes upon grain spirits which the producers of wine in the Mississippi Valley have to use is $2.10 a proof gallon under the House bill, and under the Senate committee bill $3.20 a proof gallon. The grape brandy with which the wines of California have to be fortified and are, as a matter of fact, fortified, are taxed under the House bill only 20 cents, so that the wine producer of the Mississippi Valley would have to pay for the material that is used in fortification a tax of $3.20. The wine producers, however, of the Pacific coast will have to pay under the House bill upon spirits they use in the fortification of their wine only a tax of 20 cents a gallon.

It seems to be impossible to equalize it, but for the purpose of bringing about a more equitable adjustment your committee decided to recommend that the sweet wines that are fortified with grape brandy shall be taxed upon the basis of the alcohol that is actually in that wine after it has been fortified. Naturally that wine might develop an alcoholic content of about 12 per cent of itself, but in this process of fortification the fermentation is arrested at a point where the alcohol already developed amounts to about 6 per cent. Then they are permitted under the law to add to that 6 per cent of naturally developed alcohol grape spirits until they have raised the alcohol content up to 24 per cent. So the wine of California fortified with grape brandy is alcohol to the extent of 24 per cent.

Your committee believe, and I think there is foundation for that belief, that with the curtailment of the use of spirits, of liquor, so to speak, this will become a national drink because of its high alcoholic content. It has deemed it nothing more than fair and just that this wine, with 24 per cent of alcohol in it, should be taxed upon the alcoholic content.

That is what we have done, and I think we have acted wisely about that.

Mr. SMOOT. That is, with the additional tax.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is with the additional tax of $1.10. The brandy that is used in it at the present time is taxed only 10 cents, and under the House bill it is taxed only 20 cents per proof gallon. If this wine was fortified with grain spirits, as the wines of the Mississippi Valley have to be fortified, the spirits that they would use in its fortification would be taxed $3.20 per proof gallon. But to be fair to the wine growers of California, we propose in this bill to impose a tax upon the grape brandy used in fortification under the law, and no grape brandy can be produced except for fortification of wines. We propose not a $3.10 tax, but we propose an additional tax upon that material of only $1. So they will have to pay a tax of only $1.10 as against $3.20 on the other wine, and they will have to pay an additional tax of only $1.10 per proof gallon upon the actual alcohol that is in the wine. I think a mere statement of the case is all that is required.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, the chairman of the Finance Committee makes the point that the object of the committee in readjusting the rate was to equalize conditions between the wine growers of the Pacific slope and the wine growers of the Mississippi Valley.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me interrupt the Senator. I said that was one of the reasons we had in view; but the other was to tax the alcohol that is in that wine.

Mr. PHELAN. The eastern growers use no grain spirits but grape spirits, with the exception of a few. Now, since the law forbids the use of grain, all will have to use grape spirits for fortification, and hence our cause is a common one. I should think the only object the committee would have would be to raise revenue and not to go into the question of disputes between rival wine makers, especially when there is now no dispute.

I think I demonstrated beyond peradventure of doubt from the actual figures that the wine industry would be destroyed, and hence there would be no source of revenue, by the imposition of this tax. At the time when the wine industry collapsed, a year and a half ago, reducing the revenue of the Government from that source one-half, the rate upon brandy used in fortification was 55 cents, which was so burdensome that all the wine growers rose to protect against it, and the conferees of the Senate and House reduced it to 10 cents. Under that rate——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. PHELAN. I will finish my sentence. Under that rate the revenues of the Government were doubled; that is, by reducing the rate from 55 cents to 10 cents. Now the committee proposes to make it not 10 cents, as it is, not 20 cents, as the House now proposes—and the House has doubled the present rate—not 55 cents, which proved destructive, but $1.10! Hence I think it is perfectly obvious that the rate will produce no revenue at all. I can not understand or follow such an argument as the chairman [Mr. SIMMONS] has made. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I think it is only fair to state, if I may be permitted to suggest it, that when the 55-cent rate was adopted it was late in the fall, after the vintage season was over and the California wine producers, who were getting all of this bonus, had fortified the vintage of that year with grape brandy, which was taxed at 3 cents only. That accounts for the falling off; but the California wine producer had been very diligent in disseminating the information that the revenues fell off because of the increase. If they had allowed that rate to have continued long enough until matters could adjust themselves the revenue would have been very much larger.

More than that, the men who came down here in the interest of the California grape producers had a clause in their contract whereby if there should be an increase in the tax on grape brandy the contract which they had with the grape farmer would be null and void at the option of the wine producer, and although they came here and pretended that they were here representing the grape farmer, they went back and canceled their contracts and left the farmer with the grapes on their own hands.

Mr. PHELAN. I should like to ask the Senator what year was that? It relates to ancient history, does it not?

Mr. POMERENE. It occured in the early history of this wine fight, I think before the Senator was a Member of this body.

Mr. PHELAN. But I do not quite understand the position of the Senator from Ohio. He represents a wine-producing State. There are 12,000 acres of vines in Ohio, as against 350,000 in California, but still he is interested in the settlement of the wine question. I have been in communication with the American Wine Association, composed of eastern men, men from New York, Ohio, and Missouri. Mr. Travis, of North Carolina, is probably the most capable man in the American Wine Association. Mr. Travis informed me that this rate was utterly destructive not only of the California wine industry but of the eastern wine industry. I am rather curious to know from the Senator from Ohio what his attitude is with regard to this rate we are discussing. I can not believe that he is in favor of it.

Mr. POMERENE. I have taken no position at all with respect to this tax on intoxicating liquors. It was first called to my attention some years ago by the Ohio grape-producing industry. It was then that I became interested in the subject, because our grapes were used largely in the making of wine. When they would produce sweet wines they were obliged to pay for their fortifying agent at the rate of $1.10 per gallon. The Californians by some manipulation of the legislation in 1890 got at that time their grape brandy absolutely free of tax. That was by virtue of certain provisions which were injected into the bill in conference, and the matter was not even discussed on the floor of the Senate or on the floor of the House.

Mr. PHELAN. That was in 1890?

Mr. POMERENE. That was in 1890. The result was that with the absolutely free brandy at that time the Californians drove everybody else out of the market, or practically destroyed the grape industry in the East. A few years later there was a tax of 3 cents per gallon placed upon this grape brandy. It was said to cover the cost of inspection in the California vineyards.

One object I had in mind was first to increase the revenue. When I took this up I presented it to the distinguished Senator from North Carolina, then the chairman of the committee, as he is now. The other was to equalize the legislative privileges as between the two sections of the country. That was the extent of my interest in the subject.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I explained earlier in the day that Californians went to Spain for the purpose of creating a new industry and studied the sweet-wine question. They found there that the Spanish Government, while taxing alcohol and brandy very high, as most governments do, remitted the tax absolutely on spirits that were used for fortifying sweet wines, in order that the industry might live and thrive.

So in 1890 these Californians who had gone to Spain for the purpose of obtaining information to create a new industry in America asked the Congress to reduce the tax, which was then and is now a very heavy tax, on brandy to a nominal rate of 3 cents per gallon, not as a brandy-revenue proposition but to cover the cost of inspection, and create a new taxable industry. That obtained for 16 years, during which time this industry was created. Now, having been created by favor of the Government, it is proposed to regard brandy which is used in fortification as commercial brandy, to be taxed in the same way, and so deprive the sweet-wine makers of its use.

The brandy used in fortification is not, I contend, to add alcoholic strength to wine, but is merely to arrest the natural fermentation; for if it were not added, fermentation would go on and spoil the wine. It holds the alcoholic content produced by natural processes so that it will not spoil and sour the wine and is not for the purpose of adding alcoholic strength. So the Senator in charge of this bill is absolutely in error as a scientific proposition when he says that such brandies are used for the purpose of increasing the alcoholic strength of the wine.

That being true, it is merely a question for the tax-laying power to determine whether it is right to destroy this industry by putting brandy used for such a purpose on a commercial-brandy basis or allowing a reasonable tax which will raise revenue and cover inspection on the wine so produced. That rate when it was 55 cents reduced the revenues of the Government from three millions and a half to approximately $1,800,000, and when the rate was reduced from 55 cents, a year and a half ago, to 10 cents, the revenues of the Government doubled.

Now, the House has doubled the rate; it has not made it prohibitive, but has doubled it. Instead of 10 cents, under which this industry throve and produced revenue last year, they have made it 20 cents. The flat tax on sweet wine of 10 cents, they have made 10 cents more—a total of 23 cents, as it figures out—while the product is selling at 35 cents. Under the proposed measure as it came from the other House, the tax is, I repeat, 23 cents, while the product, as I have said, is selling for 35 cents. Under that rule, the winemen believe that they may be able to make a living—for no fortunes have ever been made in wine making—and pay some taxes, but under a higher rate they can not do so. They are now enjoying one-half the rate which is proposed by the House, and just get along.

On behalf of that industry, in order to help solve this problem and hoping to produce more revenue, we would consent to the House rate, which, I repeat, is double the present rate; but I still insist that the rate proposed by the committee would be destructive of the industry. I desire the Senate to understand that that is the situation, and I am very sorry that the committee has not given the Senate fuller and more correct information. I have presented these facts as I believe them to be. Why should the wine industry place its reliance wholly upon the other House, which, under the Constitution, is, I grant, the body in which revenue measures must originate?

I am telling you what I know. Why should not the Senate settle this question with wisdom? The House has discussed this matter; the House committee has made its recommendation; it has doubled existing rates; and certainly it ought to be sufficient for the Senate to know that the other House, in full possession and understanding of the facts, has prepared an increased and possibly equitable schedule.

I must say, judging from the statement of the chairman of the Finance Committee concerning the use of brandy in fortification, that he seems to be in error; and being in error, his error would naturally disseminate itself amongst members of the committee, and it would then filter into the Senate if I were not in a position to give the Senate a correct understanding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 34, section 310. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I should like a further expression of the Senate on the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will again put the question.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I think we ought to have a quorum here. This is an important question. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gronna	Martin	Shields
Bankhead	Harding	Myers	Simmons
Beckham	Hollis	Nelson	Smith, Mich.
Borah	Husting	New	Smoot
Brady	Johnson, Cal.	Norris	Sterling
Brandegee	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Sutherland
Broussard	Kendrick	Phelan	Swanson
Calder	Kenyon	Pittman	Thompson
Chamberlain	King	Poindexter	Townsend
Colt	Knox	Pomerene	Trammell
Culberson	La Follette	Ransdell	Underwood
Curtis	Lewis	Reed	Vardaman
Dillingham	Lodge	Saulsbury	Watson
France	McKellar	Shafroth	Weeks
Gerry	McNary	Sheppard	Wolcott

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], on account of sickness, and to state that he is paired with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. This announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question recurs on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next committee amendment passed over will be stated.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance passed over was, on page 36, line 12, to change the number of the section from "306" to "312," and in line 19, after the words "a tax," to strike out "equal to such tax" and insert "of $1 per proof gallon," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 312. That upon all grape brandy or wine spirits withdrawn by a producer of wines from any fruit distillery or special bonded warehouse under subdivision (c) of section 402 of the act entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," approved September 8, 1916, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid in addition to the tax therein imposed, a tax of $1 per proof gallon, to be assessed, collected, and paid under the provisions of existing law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I was under the impression that when the Senate agreed to the other amendments on this subject the agreement affected these several items which were just now being read. Otherwise, I should have called for a yea-and-nay vote. I do not want it to appear that there was unanimous acquiescence in the amendment, because there is not. I wish the Chair would be good enough to put the question on the amendment to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment just stated. [Putting the question.]

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 36, line 22, to change the number of the section from "307" to "313"; in the same line, before the words "all sweet wines," to strike out "Upon" and insert "That upon"; in line 23, after the words "Act is," to strike out "passed" and insert "enacted"; in line 25, before the words "per proof gallon," to strike out "10 cents" and insert "$1"; on page 37, line 1, before the words "per proof gallon," to strike out "10 cents" and insert "$1," and in line 5, after the words "to the," to strike out "passage" and insert "enactment," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 313. That upon all sweet wines held for sale by the producer thereof upon the day this act is enacted there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid an additional tax equivalent to $1 per proof gallon upon the grape brandy or wine spirits used in the fortification of such wine, and an additional tax of $1 per proof gallon shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid upon all grape brandy or wine spirits withdrawn by a producer of sweet wines for the purpose of fortifying such wines and not so used prior to the enactment of this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. PHELAN. I call for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee on which the Senator from California calls for the yeas and nays. Is the demand supported?

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I merely desire an expression of the Senate by viva voce vote. I wish the question to be put on the amendments and not to have it appear that they are agreed to by unanimous consent, because they are not agreed to by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator from California to call for the yeas and nays, and the Chair respected the wish of the Senator from California. The Chair now understands the Senator from California asks for a viva voce vote. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee. [Putting the question.]

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over will be found on page 44.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I should like very much to go on with the consideration of the amendments, but the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] indicated to me a few moments ago that he desired to address himself briefly to a section that has not been reached, and wished to do so now, because he is compelled to leave the Chamber.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to discuss for a very short time the Senate committee amendment, which is found on page 96 of the bill, and which proposes to increase the present flat rate on second-class mail matter. The Senate committee amendment reads as follows:

SEC. 1101. That on and after 30 days after the enactment of this act the rate of postage on all mail matter of the second class shall be, in addition to the existing rate, one-fourth of a cent per pound or fraction thereof.

The present rate, Mr. President, on second-class mail matter, as we all know, is a flat rate of 1 cent a pound. It brings to the Government the sum of about $11,000,000 a year in income, while the service costs the Government somewhere in the neighborhood of $100,000,000. The net loss to the Government in carrying second-class mail matter, therefore, is in the neighborhood of $89,000,000. If this amendment shall be adopted, instead of being $89,000,000 the loss upon second-class mail matter will be $86,000,000; in other words, the additional amount of revenue produced by the amendment is the sum of $3,000,000.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that first-class mail matter is now producing about $80,000,000 profit. The committee has increased the rate on such matter from 2 cents to 3 cents, which will raise, according to their report, somewhere in the neighborhood of $50,000,000 of additional revenue. Substantially no increase is made in second-class mail matter. Why is this? The Government is paying out in bounties to certain publishers about $90,000,000 per year in round numbers. Why should we do this? Upon what theory is Congress year by year paying over this vast sum of money to a certain privileged class of our people?

I desire to trace the history of second-class matter for just a moment. The law providing a flat rate of 1 cent a pound for second-class matter, whether it is hauled 10 miles or whether it is hauled 3,000 miles and irrespective of the amount hauled, has been in force since 1885. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the first second-class mail matter law that was ever put upon our statute books, so far as I am advised, was the law passed in 1792, which established a zone system and fixed a rate of 1 cent on newspapers sent within a zone of 100 miles, and 1½ cents on every paper sent a farther distance than 100 miles. The country at that time was small, and there were but two zones.

The law has been changed from time to time. I think it was about 1845 or 1850 that newspapers were, by act of Congress, allowed to be distributed free, and after that time they were allowed to be distributed free in the county of publication.

The reason why these bounties were granted and these privileges extended to second-class mail matter was that the publications so carried were regarded as educators of the public, and the distribution of educational matter was deemed to the best interest of the people. Therefore certain concessions were made, possibly in the beginning amounting to a few hundred, not more than a few thousand dollars at the outside, but which have grown since that time to the enormous proportions that we now find. In the last 20 years the amount of bounty paid those who send second-class matter through the mails has increased from $30,000,000 to $90,000,000. Think of that! We are paying the publishers one-tenth of our normal income in time of peace. Ordinarily in peace times we raise from $1,000,000,000 to $1,200,000,000 a year in revenue, and $90,000,000 of that amount is paid back to this favored class of our citizens.

Let us inquire for a moment whether that practice can be defended. I have heard no one up to date defend this system outright. It is based on a wrong principle; it has nothing of substance behind it; it has nothing of fairness or justice behind it. With the exception of letters, which form an exception to the class because of their very light weight in comparison with their importance, no other kind of transportation is based on such a system. In this very department parcel-post matter is sent upon a basis of what it costs to carry the parcels to their destination, the length of the haul is fixed as a reasonable basis for the rate. That is perfectly right and proper. The railroads base their charges on the length of the haul; the telegraph companies base their charges on the distance the message is carried; all carriers and transportation agencies on land and water base their charge for the service rendered on the perfectly natural measure of length of haul. In the Post Office Department alone do we find an exception. The reason for it, as we know, has long since disappeared. It has been shown in the debate to-day that the publications which are sent to-day at such a remarkably low rate throughout the country—rates of about one-eighth of the cost—are filled with advertising matter, in fact the greater part of the magazines, of the trade journals, and practically all of the other journals is filled with advertising matter that pays almost beyond the power of the human understanding to grasp. The profits along this line are marvelous when one comes to examine the figures.

I say, Senators, that we ought to adopt now a scientific system of handling this matter. It must be obvious to any fair-minded man that the present system is not established on a just basis in reckoning the charge, and when inquiry is made into the fact it can be demonstrated that it is not fair.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] said this morning that the purpose and object should be to make this department of the Government self-sustaining, and I agree with him in that. It can not be done, however, under the flat-rate system. Why? For the reason that in order to do that it would be necessary to increase the flat rate from 1 cent a pound to 8 cents a pound on all matter carried—an absolutely prohibitive rate, which would do away with the entire business, because other methods of transportation would be found.

What is the only reasonable basis in order to make it self-sustaining? There can be but one basis, and that is the basis that experience and history and common knowledge have adopted in carrying parcels of weight by every other known means of transportation. This basis is the zone system. The Government has established the zone system in parcels post, and what is it doing? It is reaping $10,000,000 profit a year out of it, and has reduced the charges on the people by more than 50 per cent over what they enjoyed before the parcels post was put into effect. Does not that demonstrate that the service can be performed, it can be made to pay, and the people get the benefits of that service at a low rate?

The same principle should be established about second-class matter. We should establish the zone system. Let us look at it from a practical standpoint. I have nothing to say against these great periodicals that are now enjoying such great favors at the hands of the American people by our consent and with our approval. I do not know whether it is thoroughly known or not just what remarkable gifts we are making them year by year in our various appropriation bills under this arrangement.

I am going to illustrate for a moment by referring to two or three well-known examples.

The Curtis Publishing Co., of Philadelphia, own and publish three papers that I know of. They may publish more, but I know they publish three. One is the Saturday Evening Post, the second is the Ladies' Home Journal, and the third is the Country Gentleman. The Government, by way of bounty under the present flat rate, pays to that company in the way of transportation of its paper known as the Saturday Evening Post a little more than $3,000,000 every year. The Ladies' Home Journal gets nearly $1,300,000 every year, the County Gentleman a little over $400,000 a year. Altogether these three cost the United States Government for transportation as second-class matter about $4,800,000; and about 60 per cent of the matter in those papers is advertising matter.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do.

Mr. HARDWICK. I just wanted to ask the Senator this question: Does he say it costs the Government that much for transportation alone?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no.

Mr. HARDWICK. It includes overhead charges?

Mr. McKELLAR. It includes overhead charges. In using the word "transportation" I have included the overhead charges in carrying on the transportation.

Can that be defended? Can any Senator rise in his place and say that the United States Government should single out this company and pay to it by way of rebate on postal rates—because that is in substance what it is—the enormous sum of four million seven or eight hundred thousand dollars a year? I do not think it can be defended.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator further yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Curtis Publishing Co. are the largest users of the second-class mail privilege in the United States, I think.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. In justice to them I wish to say that a little more than a year ago, perhaps a year and a half ago, when we had this question before the Senate, and we proposed a very moderate increase, only about double, in the second-class rate, the Curtis Publishing Co. was one of the few great publishing companies in the United States that agreed to it. They thought the rate ought to be increased. They did not pretend to contend that it is right that they should be kept like they are. Although they are the greatest beneficiaries of this privilege in the country, they say themselves that the rate ought to be increased.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad to know that. If I knew of that fact before, it had escaped my attention. I want to say this about the Curtis Publishing Co.: As we all know, they publish three of the best journals that there are in the country, and they are to be commended for that; but my point is that I do not believe that the Curtis Publishing Co. or any other company should receive an immense bounty like this from the Government.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. A large increase in the zone rate, though, would put a great many leading publications out of business; and I can understand the Curtis Co.'s position.

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, I say this: I say that if the Curtis Publishing Co. or any other company can not live or stand on its own bottom without a bounty from the United States Government, then we ought not to give them that bounty. We ought to let them go into some other business.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I thoroughly concur in what the Senator has just said. If these men can not get along without a governmental bounty, then they had better quit doing business. I want to say, however, so that I will not misrepresent the Curtis Co., that I do not know that they would agree to anything like what we ought to do; but they do say themselves, and they agreed more than a year ago, that the rate ought to be at least doubled. As a matter of fact, it ought to be increased a great deal more than that. I do not know whether they would be willing to go as far as I am or not.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have nothing in the world of an unkind nature to say about the Curtis Co. or any other company, but what I mean to say is that I indorse their proposition if they have made a proposition to cut this bounty in two; and if they have themselves come to the conclusion that we are too generous to them, that we are giving them too much, and they are willing to take just one-half of what they have been receiving, we certainly might accept that proposition to begin with.

I have said that much about the concrete facts in order, if I may, to call pointedly to the attention of the Senate what we are doing in this matter.

What do we do if we adopt the Senate amendment, or an increase in the flat rate of one-fourth of 1 cent a pound? Why, it is mere child's play. The Curtis Co., as the Senator from Georgia says, virtually admitted that they would be willing to cut theirs in two.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; I said to double the present rates.

Mr. McKELLAR. To double the present rates. Why, you get from all the magazines in this country—and the magazines are the ones who get the principal bounties—if you adopt this amendment you get only $3,000,000 from all of them; and here is the Curtis Publishing Co. alone getting four million seven or eight hundred thousand dollars of a bounty! I say that if we are not going to do anything more than that, we had better let it alone and let it stay just like it is. I would rather see the rate stand just like it is than to be increased one-quarter of 1 cent and raise only $3,000,000.

Now, let us see about this. What we should do, now that the matter is up, is to adopt a right and a just and a fair basis. I do not care at all about deliberately making these publications bear the entire expense now if, as they claim, it would injure them irreparably, if it would interfere with the business of the country to some extent. I expect it is true that it would, and for that reason I have introduced an amendment that I want to explain for just a moment. It is known as a zone amendment, a moderate zone amendment.

The House amendment to the present law provided that the increase in the first zone of 50 miles was to be one-sixth of a cent—1⅛ cents for the first zone, 1⅜ cents for the second zone, and 1⅝ cents for the third zone. Then it gradually increased, and under the terms of the House amendment, as I understand it, there would be produced as additional revenue, as it was estimated, about the sum of $19,000,000.

Suppose we adopted the House provision. It would establish a zone system, and it would have raised $19,000,000. We would still lose about $70,000,000 by the transaction. We would still be contributing about $70,000,000 as bounties to these favored classes of our citizens. What we ought to do is to establish a right basis, and then, by degrees, take away these bounties. It is going to be a hard job, of course; but the only way we can do it fairly and justly and equitably is to fix a zone basis based upon the length of haul and then just gradually work up to it. That is what I propose to do in my amendment, and I want now to explain that amendment.

It differs a little bit from the House amendment in this respect, and I want to explain why that is: In the first three zones of 300 miles it makes no change in the present rate. In the next zone it adds a cent, and another cent in the next zone, and so on, until the rate is 6 cents in the last zone. I sent that amendment down to the Post Office Department and asked them to give me a statement as to how much revenue it would produce, and I have their report, which shows that it will produce twelve million six hundred and some odd thousand dollars.

Now, you will see that under the Senate amendment we do not change the system at all. We just add a quarter of a cent. Under the House provision the zone system was adopted, and an increase was made all along the line and $19,000,000 of additional revenue produced. My amendment is just a compromise between the two, and I want to give the reason for that compromise now. I want to give the reason why I have changed the rate from the House provision in the first three zones.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I am perfectly willing to let the Senator finish his explanation before I ask the question.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; go ahead. I would just as soon have the Senator ask it now.

Mr. NORRIS. I wanted to ask the Senator why in his amendment he left the rate the same as it is—that is, a 1-cent rate—in the first three zones, and in that connection I should like to ask him if he does not think that in the first zone the present rate ought to be reduced?

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator means in the first zone of 50 miles?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; perhaps the first 100 miles; maybe the first two zones. I understand from newspaper men and publishers that most of the publications now are sent by express the first few hundred miles, and—using the same illustration that the Senator used—I understand that the Curtis Publishing Co., in sending the Saturday Evening Post, for instance, instead of sending it out by mail at 1 cent, send it by express for the first several hundred miles where the cities are close enough together. For instance, from Philadelphia to New York City I understand that they send their publication by express, because they get a rate of less than 1 cent.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is entirely correct about that. They only use the bounty of the Government when it pays them to use it.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. And they disregard it when it does not pay them.

Mr. NORRIS. Why, of course. That is natural.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is perfectly natural. The Senator has just asked a question which I intended to explain at this time, and I take great pleasure in stating the reason for my figures. I believe they are disagreed to, in part, at any rate, by my friend from Georgia; but I believe that these figures are fairly accurate, and I desire to give them to the Senate.

A very careful examination has been made by a number of gentlemen to ascertain what is the actual cost, especially in regard to newspapers; and I want to say that if Senators have not examined that particular phase of the situation they will find upon an examination a marked difference, almost as marked as the difference between letter postage and newspaper postage. They will find almost as marked a difference between newspapers and more bulky second-class matter, such as magazines and trade journals and publications of that sort; and it has been found, substantially speaking, that in the zone of 300 miles—the first three zones, according to our system of reckoning—the present rate of 1 cent pays for the cost of transportation, and for a part, if not all, of the overhead charge.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator says "it has been found." Will the Senator tell me by whom?

Mr. McKELLAR. By the newspaper men themselves.

Mr. HARDWICK. They found that?

Mr. McKELLAR. And it is very natural that they should know.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, I know; but you can not take their judgment on that.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not ask you to take their judgment; but I am producing the figures that are right, because they are interested in the matter.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not blame the Senator for doing that, but I just want the Senate to understand that those are the figures of the newspaper men, and that I can demonstrate, I think, beyond a peradventure of a doubt, that they are not within 20 per cent of the truth. Now, if the Senator will pardon me—and then I will let him go on with his figures—they do not figure in the overhead charges at all. The cost of transportation is double what they figure it to be on the first 300 miles, and they have not counted the 4.68 cents of overhead charges at all. At least, that is what the experts of the Post Office Department say, who have no interest, financial or otherwise, to serve in the matter. That is what they contend, as I will show the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, Mr. President, I differ with the Senator, and I am going to show, if I can, the figures, and I will ask the Senator's very careful examination of these figures that I have.

Mail is transported in cars of various sizes—60-foot cars, 30-foot cars, and 15-foot spaces in cars, as we all know—varying in the various localities with the amount of mail to be hauled. A very careful examination has been made to find out just what the Government pays for the transportation of newspapers within the zone of 300 miles—that is, the cost of transportation—and the result of that examination, allowing 40 per cent of all cars returned empty, too, shows that in the first zone it costs a little over seventeen one-hundredths of a cent, in the second zone of 150 miles just a little over forty one-hundredths of a cent, in the third zone of 300 miles a little over seventy-eight one-hundredths of a cent, making in all an average cost of transporting newspapers of about forty-eight one-hundredths of a cent.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I ask there whether the Senator distinguishes between the cost of hauling newspapers and the cost of hauling magazines?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am doing that right now. That is just what I am trying to relate.

Mr. HARDWICK. These figures apply to newspapers only?

Mr. McKELLAR. These figures apply to newspapers.

Mr. HARDWICK. But the cost is exactly the same. An ounce of newspapers is just as much as an ounce of magazines, no more and no less, by weight. An ounce of newspapers weighs just as much as an ounce of magazines.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator does not catch my meaning. Nor do I agree with the Senator that the cost is the same. What I am showing now is that in this zone of 300 miles, in which newspapers principally circulate, the ordinary State papers, the cost is about what I have stated. Now, the overhead charges amount to more than that.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. In those figures made up by these newspaper men, which I expect to be able to prove are not accurate, they do not include anything except what is paid to the railroads to carry this matter. That is true, is it not?

Mr. McKELLAR. They include only the cost of transportation which I have mentioned, which is less than one-half a cent.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is what I say.

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, surely the cost of the overhead charges in that particular zone will not be over fifty-two one-hundredths of a cent remaining.

Mr. HARDWICK. As a matter of fact, it is very much over that.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; the difference between the figures of the Post Office Department, to which the Senator refers, and the figures as they actually are, is that the Post Office Department does this: It shows the cost of transportation for the whole country, and then adds the entire overhead charges of the Post Office Department on all classes of mail.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator——

Mr. McKELLAR. Just a moment.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator does not want to misrepresent me.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; surely not.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is not accurate. Of course I am saying this with all respect and regard for the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, of course.

Mr. HARDWICK. On the contrary, they have worked it out by these very zone systems, and they show that the result is many times what the Senator's friends, the newspaper publishers, have told him it costs.

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, now, this proposition is unquestionably true, as we all know it, that it costs now 8 cents a pound to carry the entire matter. We all know that the farther you carry it the greater the cost to the Government. Now, there is a zone—circumscribed, it is true—which does pay for itself, and we all know it. Now, where will the Senator fix that zone?

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, there is not a one under the existing law; not a one——

Mr. McKELLAR. I differ with the Senator about that.

Mr. HARDWICK (continuing). Because of the overhead charges, even for a short haul.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, you can tack on overhead charges in such a way as to bring up this matter of cost.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, we have to pay them.

Mr. McKELLAR. I know. We pay them in the way of bounties to these men who have their periodicals hauled thousands of miles, and there is where the cost comes in.

The Senator from Georgia has introduced an amendment, to do what? To fix an advertising measure. I do not believe that that will do the work. Why? Because you still have the flat rate. You still have to do the impossible thing. What is it? You still have to make this system self-sustaining by adding to the rate. It makes no difference whether you measure it by way of the advertising contained in a particular paper or whether you measure it by the whole paper. That is immaterial. It is a flat rate. You can not put into effect a flat rate that will make this system self-sustaining. You can put into effect a zone system, because we have demonstrated that in the parcels post.

Some people will say: "Why, the reason that the Government should give this bounty is the same reason for which we started it in the beginning, that it is a great educational proposition." Well, surely, admitting that an educational proposition is one of the most important propositions on earth—and it is—it can not be more important than the transportation of food and drink to the people; and yet if they undertake to transport food by parcels post they have got to pay the cost of it and a slight profit to the Government. Why should not these publications be made to pay in like manner? But that is not true. Why, under this flat-rate bounty or subsidy system the remarkable fact stands out that if you send schoolbooks from one part of the country to the other you pay about four times as much as you do for the transportation of these trade journals and these magazines through the mails. Any kind of books. If you transport the Bible, you pay a great deal more for the transportation of the Bible through the mails than you pay for transporting——

Mr. NORRIS. Funny papers.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; funny papers like Puck or Judge or any other paper. Now, can anybody defend it? I do not believe it can be defended; and I am not surprised that the Curtis Publishing Co., when they appeared before a committee, stated that they were willing to give up a part of this bounty that was being furnished them.

Now, coming back to the newspaper proposition, the newspaper proposition is in a different situation from these magazines and trade journals. There is no doubt in the world about that.

In the first place, I think the Senator from Georgia is entirely wrong in the figures. We all know that it does not cost the same proportion or overhead charges for the handling in a circumscribed zone as it does in a large zone. That is obvious. That position can not be doubted for a moment, and surely the overhead charges can not be greater than the transportation. It is not so generally. The transportation of all these things costs over 50 per cent, taking them as a whole. Now, when you find that the transportation in the first zone costs less than a half cent, surely the allowance of a little more than half a cent for overhead charges is a proper allowance.

There is another matter to be considered about this. Just as I stated before, there is a wide difference in the cost of transporting heavy trade journals, immense numbers of Saturday Evening Posts, and magazines of that character, and the cost of transporting newspapers. It costs less for the newspapers. It is a different kind of paper. It is not so heavy and the cost of transportation is less. Now, our proposition is this—eventually to make them all self-sustaining. Let it be determined by the department just how much it costs to transport the various kinds of publications. Adopt the right system to begin with, and then just gradually increase the rate until you make this department of the Government self-sustaining, just like the parcels post.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. I want to ask the Senator if he thinks a revenue bill is the proper place for establishing a system of carrying the mails?

Mr. McKELLAR. Ordinarily, I would say not; but when you use the system of carrying mails for the purpose of raising revenue, it is certainly appropriate to adopt the proper system in that bill, and I do think that if we have done wrong in the past by adopting a flat rate, if by continuing the flat rate we can not raise the necessary revenue, why, of course, it ought to be changed. I want to say another thing to the Senator: I have not been in legislative bodies long, and I have not had a very long experience, but I have found whenever any concern was receiving a bounty from the Government that whenever you undertake to take that bounty away from that concern that concern never thinks the time is the right time.

They want an investigation. They want it put off until some time when they can investigate it and determine more accurately just how much their bounty is. My notion is that it is indefensible to indorse this flat rate any more.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. May I suggest to the Senator that this very subject has been under investigation since Postmaster General Bissell.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad the Senator referred to that. I wish to say that not only under Mr. Cleveland's administration but under Mr. McKinley's administration, under Mr. Roosevelt's, and under Mr. Taft's, and under the present administration, every head of the Post Office Department has made a report to Congress, urging Congress to change this system; and not only that, I think it was in Mr. Taft's administration that a commission, the chairman of which was no less a person than the Hon. Charles E. Hughes, was appointed to investigate and did investigate and made a report. Nothing was done. There was always another time when the matter ought to come up, it was never in the bill, it was never the exact way of handling it, we always wanted to get some other kind of a system. Now we have the very thing under investigation. We want to raise the money to carry on this great war. We have got to raise the money.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. Just one moment. We have got to raise the money, and here is a part of our citizenship drawing enormous sums, $89,000,000, yearly in benefits, in private benefits, to help them to carry on their advertising matter. I say to the Senator that one of these firms on one of its issues receives in pay for advertisements a sum so enormous that it is almost staggering to the ordinary man. Now I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask the Senator as a matter of information, if it is not true that during the last Congress or perhaps the Congress before a committee, either of the House or the Senate or of both bodies, made a very full investigation upon this subject and amendments were proposed to the appropriation bill, and it seems that even though legislation was proposed which was the result of those investigations those who were interested in the continuance of the bounty were insisting upon further investigation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course they were, and it has been that way since I have been in either branch of Congress. We all know that it ought to be changed. I do not believe I can ever recall hearing anyone defend it. I remember just a day or two ago when a member of the Finance Committee was making a speech and referred to the matter—I refer to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]—when these figures were referred to him he at once admitted that they were true. We know it is an abuse that has grown up, and grown up in a remarkable degree in the last 20 years.

It was $30,000,000, and everybody thought when we began to investigate it that that was an immense sum, that $30,000,000 was given in bounty for this purpose. Now that has grown to $90,000,000—three times—and now when the Government needs the money, when we are engaged in a great war, they are objecting to taking away even the small sum of $12,500,000 of the bounties we are giving them to help the Government carry on the war.

The amendment I have offered is a compromise. I think it ought to be accepted by every Senator here. It establishes a proper basis. It does not interfere with anyone. There is some reason for it. The Senator from Georgia took me to task somewhat for giving the newspaper men's figures here. I gave those figures with a great deal of pleasure, and I thought they ought to be given, and I say that is in conformity with our history as a legislative body.

The time was, I believe, in 1845 when newspapers were permitted to go through the mails free. We have always given them some concession, and now I am not asking any concession for them. I am merely pointing out to the Senate that in the first zone of 300 miles, substantially speaking, the newspapers are paying their own way, and if they are, and we are giving these vast subsidies to the other publishers, surely we might be fair to the newspapers who are already paying their own way. That is what I ask in this amendment of mine and that is what is going to be the result. It means that the newspapers will pay their own way where they circulate only 300 miles, but if they circulate more than that, if they go a farther distance, they pay the increased zone rate. Surely that is fair.

In addition to that they pay the special taxes imposed in this bill. They pay the regular income tax that all other corporations pay. Under those circumstances it seems to me that there is but one fair and just thing to do. We must look this matter in the face just as it is. We can not just blot the subsidy all out at one blow, in one act. We can not do away with the subsidy at one time. If we do away with one-sixth of it a Congress we will be doing very well. If we do away with only $12,600,000 out of the $89,000,000, when we have done that we have established a right basis, fair and just and equitable, and then we can proceed, and if our magazine-publishing friends want an investigation in the future, having adopted the right system, we can proceed to handle the matter in accordance with the facts.

Mr. President, I ask permission now to have printed in the RECORD a statement which was prepared by a number of newspaper men which gives the figures to which I have referred already. It points out the difference in the cost of the Government transporting newspapers and other second-class postal matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave will be granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

NEWSPAPERS NOT RESPONSIBLE FOR ANNUAL DEFICITS IN POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

To the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The many statements coming from various sources and unwittingly admitted, in a way, even by some of the publishers of newspapers to the effect that the Congress of the United States and the Post Office Department, in recognition of services rendered by the newspapers through the country, had favored the newspapers in the matter of postal rates and thereby helped to create a large annual deficit in the Post Office Department, caused a member of this committee early in May last to begin an investigation of the subject, in which he had the courteous assistance of the Hon. JOHN A. MOON, chairman of the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and also the willing aid of the officials of the Post Office Department.

What was discovered in May caused this member to feel that the statements in question were not justified by the facts, and hence upon his return to Washington in June he determined to resume his search for further facts, and therefore, on the 25th of June, submitted the following inquiry to the Hon. James B. Corridon, head of the Bureau of Railway Adjustments:

FACTS ELICITED.

"What does the department, under the space basis, pay to railroads for the use and service of 60-foot and 30-foot cars in length, respectively, for following distance, to wit:

"Mail pay, one way, 100 pounds, 60-foot car basis.

	Cents.
First zone, 50 miles	0.12 5/14
Second zone, 150 miles	.29 1/14
Third zone, 300 miles	.56 3/14

"Assuming that the average weight carried per car aggregates 12,000 pounds per trip, what will be the cost to the Government per 100 pounds paid to the railroad on each of the above-mentioned distances? I do not mean to include overhead charges or expenses incurred by the department in any other way in the above figures, but only what the department pays to the railroads under the space-contract system, the cost, of course, to include initial terminal allowance to the railroads for each one-way trip, which, I presume, for example, should be added to each 300-mile haul, that being about the average distance of a one-way daily trip."

The honorable Mr. Corridon, after having directed a careful investigation, had inserted under the head of "Mail pay, one way, 100 pounds, 60-foot car basis," the figures opposite each of these three zones as shown.

In presenting this paper thus completed, as an answer to the inquiry, Mr. Corridon stated it should be borne in mind that on several of the roads, and particularly trunk lines running east and west, there were cars required on the trips westward which had to be returned empty, and upon which returned empty cars the mileage was paid for by the Government at the same rate per mile as though they were loaded, and that according to his best estimate these empties would represent not exceeding 40 per cent eastbound of the total number of loaded cars westbound, but he did not believe that many cars were returned empty in either direction on roads running north and south.

COST OF CARRYING MAIL FIRST 300-MILE ZONE.

Allowing for 40 per cent of all cars returned empty would, on the basis of the figures of cost as given in the inquiry above referred to, fix the following "mail pay one way, 100 pounds, 60-foot car basis":

	Cents.
First zone, 50 miles—per 100 pounds	0.17 5/14
Second zone, 150 miles—do	.40 5/14
Third zone, 300 miles—do	.78 3/14

Making the average cost for the first two zones 0.29 cents per 100 pounds and for the three zones 0.48 5/14 cents per 100 pounds.

The suggestion has been advanced that the foregoing figures are erroneous, and that the estimate of the daily weight of mail carried upon which they are based will not average 12,000 pounds per car.

Assuming the daily average to be less than 12,000 pounds, it is equally true that the estimate of cost is based on the largest sized cars in use by any railroad and the highest price paid by the Government for the use of such cars. It is therefore not unreasonable to contend that in cases where the daily mail per car does not average 12,000 pounds cars of less size are used. In other words, it stands to reason that the department would not employ the use of the largest cars and invite the largest cost when cars of less size and less cost would answer the purpose.

We have, through the kindness of the department and the courtesy of Hon. JOHN A. MOON, chairman of the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, been furnished with a schedule of prices paid by the department for cars and space supplied by the railroads to the Government, as follows:

Rates of pay, railroad mail service, space basis.

Class of service	Rate per mile.	Initial terminal allowance for each trip one way.
Full R. P. O cars 60 feet in length	$0.21	$4.25
Apartment R. P. O. cars 30 feet in length	.11	2.75
Apartment R. P. O. cars 15 feet in length	.06	2.00
Storage cars and storage space:
Cars 60 feet in length	.21	4.25
Cars 30 feet in length	.10½	2.12½
Apartment cars 15 feet in length	.05½	1.06½
Closed-pouch service:
Space 7 feet in length	.03	.50
Space 3 feet in length	.01½	.25

The foregoing exhibit indicates clearly that where the daily average weight per car may be only, for example, one-half—that is, 6,000 pounds—the use of cars 30 feet in length should suffice and reduce the cost to the Government correspondingly, thus leaving the cost in 30-foot cars for 6,000 pounds' weight at practically the same rate per 100 pounds that it would cost to carry 12,000 pounds in cars 60 feet in length. It also shows if the average weight should only reach 3,000 pounds per car that a compartment 15 feet in length should suffice and the use of the 15 feet space in such cases would again leave the cost to the Government at the same rate per 100 pounds. Indeed, this exhibit as to the cost of cars and space to the Government indicates that the Post Office Department under the act of Congress providing for the use of cars on a space basis has planned so wisely that even mail transported under the "closed-pouch service" is being carried at a price that entails practically no greater cost to the Government per 100 pounds in having mail carried on the smaller roads or branch lines than the cost of having larger quantities of mail carried on trunk lines in the largest mail cars in use.

DEPARTMENT ENTITLED TO COMMENDATION.

The Post Office Department, as we see it, is entitled to the highest commendation for having under the space contract system authorized by Congress planned to have the railroads enter into contracts whereby mail in any quantity may be transported by the Government for like distances at practically the same cost per 100 pounds.

The foregoing on either and all of the several bases of quantity of mail carried and cost to the Government, in so far as they apply to the first three zones of less than 300 miles, may therefore be regarded as a fair one of the cost to the Government, and since not more than 40 per cent of the circulation of the daily newspapers of the country is carried beyond the 150-mile zone the fourth zone of 600 miles might be included in the 1 cent per pound rate now existing and not exceed an average cost of 96½ cents per 100 pounds to the department, against the $1 per 100 pounds now being paid by newspaper publishers for transportation of papers within the first, second, and third zone of 300 miles.

NEWSPAPER PUBLISHERS FAIR.

But the publishers of newspapers are not asking that. Their aim is to be entirely fair to the Government and will therefore be content with the existing rate of 1 cent per pound for a distance of 300 miles. The publishers, in fact, realize that there ought to be a readjustment of the postal rate on second-class matter; that is, there should be an advance in order to prevent such a large deficit, but feel that this advance should be made under the zone system, and applied only to the zones exceeding a distance of 300 miles, which, at the existing rate of postage, fails to meet the cost of transportation paid by the Government.

In these various calculations it should be observed that the maximum price paid by the Government to the railroads for the largest mail cars is used as the basis.

The first estimates of cost, as will be observed, are based on the minimum weight of 12,000 pounds to the car of mail carried in 60-foot cars. These large cars usually have a carrying capacity of 40,000 pounds each; in fact, over that, and on many trains should carry a greater tonnage, especially when the character of the mail is of a weighty character. The figures of cost as given therefore represent fairness to the Government.

These figures represent, in like manner, the same degree of fairness in adding to the cost for a return of 40 per cent of the cars as empties for which the Government pays the railroads, even though they may contain no mail, despite the fact that on many of the railroads, especially those running north and south, the weight of mail carried is about the same in both directions. Right here it is made apparent that the great percentage of return of empty cars is due to the large shipments of magazines and other like publications westward on certain days of each week or month requiring many large cars, 40 per cent of which are returned entirely empty at an absolute total loss to the Government, because there is no mail matter going eastward to load them.

This is not the case, however, with the newspapers of the country generally. The latter, to be found in all of the cities at terminal points of the railroads, at no time require or demand extra cars or extra service. Their circulation is daily and goes in all directions, and it is these newspaper publishers, mainly in the interior and smaller cities of the country, constituting at least 90 per cent of the daily newspaper publications of the United States, who are not putting any burden upon the Post Office Department, but who will be hurt most by the proposed legislation looking to a flat increase of the postal rate, and yet they are those who are least able to bear the advance.

COST IN ZONES BEYOND 300 MILES.

We have thus shown the injustice to the large body of daily newspaper publishers of the country that a flat increase of the postal rates within the 300-mile zone would entail and, therefore, deem it not out of place to give figures, using the same basis as those employed in fixing the cost for the 300-mile zone, indicating what the cost in the zones beyond 300 miles would be, as follows, to wit:

	Per 100 pounds.
Fourth zone, 600 miles	$1.51-9
Fifth zone, 1,000 miles	2.49-9
Sixth zone, 1,400 miles	3.47-9
Seventh zone, 1,800 miles	4.45-9
Eighth zone, 2,200 miles	5.43-9
Ninth zone, 2,600 miles	6.41-9
Tenth zone, 3,000 miles	7.39-9

It will be observed that we have added three zones to the zones established for the parcel post, which are intended to cover distances beyond 1,800 miles, and by the adding of which the distance of about 3,300 miles, New York to San Francisco, is covered, except as to 300 miles, which is eliminated because of the barren territory through the Rocky Mountain section of the country, which mileage, however, in all fairness should not have been eliminated, since it cost the Government just as much per mile to carry the cars over this 300-mile area as it costs to carry them through the thickly populated sections.

FIGURES STARTLING.

These figures, even up to and including the seventh zone of 1,800 miles, are startling. They show to what extent magazines and other second-class publications (newspapers excepted) send such enormous amounts of matter, frequently almost by the trainload, that are costing the department such large sums annually. No wonder that the department is annually compelled to face such a large deficit, and yet the bill now pending in the Senate under discussion, as at present framed, does not appear to have in view any method whereby the beneficiaries of these exorbitant discriminations in their favor will be asked to bear a fair share of the burden put upon the department by them, and which has resulted in such a large deficit, so palpably unjust to the department.

All of the figures in each and all of the zones, beginning with the first to the end, were made on the basis of the cost paid to the railroads for transportation of second-class matter, including newspapers and magazines, and show to what a marked degree the relations and obligations of the newspapers in this connection have been so grievously misunderstood. Nor has the enormous extent to which the publishers of magazines and other periodicals have been favored at the expense of the Government been hitherto made so clearly apparent.

MAGAZINES FAIL BY MILLIONS TO PAY COST OF TRANSPORTATION.

Is it any wonder that some of these publishers have failed by several millions of dollars each year to pay the Government for the service rendered them? Is it any wonder that many of these publishers have added millions to their wealth from year to year? Is it at all surprising that several of these wealthy publishers failed to appear and present statements of their gross or net earnings to the Senate committee at the hearing on May 11 and 12, and is it not remarkable that any of those present should have had the temerity to urge a continuance of their pet "flat-rate basis" of postal rates which in the past has worked such discriminations in their favor and filled their coffers each year to overflowing at the expense of the Government?

We are fully persuaded and verily believe that the figures herein given will prove a distinct revelation, if not to all, at least to a large proportion of the Members of both Houses of Congress and to the country at large if the facts should be given to the public.

We repeat that all figures contained in this statement, and for each and every zone, were worked out on the basis of the figures furnished by the Hon. Mr. Corridon for the 300-mile zone, showing the actual cost paid by the Post Office Department to the railroads for the transportation of second-class matter. These, through error in calculation, may vary a fraction or so, but they are otherwise correct.

AMPLE SURPLUS TO MEET OVERHEAD EXPENSE.

It may, and doubtless will, be asked if the second-class rate of newspapers within a zone of 300 miles does not include overhead charges, such as salaries to carriers, clerks, post-office officials, and the general expense of the department, How is this charge to be met? We answer, there is ample margin between 48 cents per 100 pounds paid by the department to the railroads in the 300-mile zone and the $1 per 100 pounds paid by the newspapers to meet any fair proportion of the legitimate expenses that may be chargeable for the service rendered by the Government to the daily newspapers.

COST OF HANDLING NEWSPAPERS LIMITED.

The extent of the service rendered by the department to the newspapers is very meager as compared with the service performed in handling other mail matter. The newspaper publishers do not ask the postmaster to call at their places of publication for the papers. The publishers perform that duty. They bind the papers in appropriate bundles and haul them, not only to the post office, but in many cases to the railway station, where, after being weighed, the bags and bundles are taken to the postal car already on the train and put in the car. The service performed by the employees of the post office is to weigh the papers, which, as a rule, can be done in a few minutes for each train by one man, the only other service being that performed by the mail agent in charge of the car, whose duty it is to take care of the bundles and bags of mail until they reach their destination, and then throw them off on the platform for an agent of the newspaper to receive them and make delivery to the subscribers. This system adds little or nothing to the expense of the department, since the man who weighs the bundles at the station also looks after the delivery of other mail from the post office to go out on the same trains, and the mail agent who handles the papers on the train and throws them off at destination would receive the same rate of wages that he now receives whether he handled these papers or not, nor would there be any diminution of the amount paid to the railroads for hauling newspapers if they hauled none, since the railroads are paid so much per mile for hauling the cars, whether loaded to their capacity or empty. Therefore the larger number of papers the department can induce the publishers to send by mail the greater the net revenue to the department. If half of the capacity of each car were filled with newspapers, it would serve to add that much to the net receipts of the department, whereas if no newspapers were hauled, it would not diminish the expense of the department to the extent of a farthing, but only serve to decrease its receipts.

NEWSPAPERS ON RURAL ROUTES.

The same is also true of newspapers delivered on rural routes. These papers are also carried, either to the station or the post office by the publishers. The papers are put in bundles. All of the bundles are marked to show to what route each is destined.

Take, for illustration, Columbia, Tenn., about 40 miles from Nashville, from which a number of rural routes diverge. The bundles for each route are made up by the publisher and marked. They are then put into bags, tagged "Columbia Rural Routes, No. 1, 2, 3, 4," etc. When these bags reach Columbia the only handling by the postmaster is to have them carried from the station to the post office. The rural route carriers know from the tags which bag contains their bundle. They take their respective bundles out of the bag and deliver the papers to each rural route subscriber, as they do other mail matter.

The rural carriers are paid a monthly wage. Whether they each carry 10 newspapers or 100 makes no difference in the cost to the department. The expense remains the same. The only question is, Shall the publishers of newspapers be permitted to continue to solicit subscriptions on rural routes or shall they be forced to put up their subscription price, and thus largely curtail their number of subscribers?

Suppose a newspaper in Tennessee, which is now paying the Government $40,000 per annum for the carriage of such newspapers as it desires to have transported by mail should advance its subscription price so as to cut off half of its circulation by mail. Would that help the Government? Would it in any sense enable the Government to decrease its expenses? Would it not, on the other hand, simply cause the Government a loss of net revenue to the extent of $20,000 per annum from this one newspaper?

ESTABLISHMENT OF RURAL ROUTES.

The establishment of rural routes has been a great boon to the body of the people engaged in agricultural pursuits and all well-managed newspapers have sought to render material aid in the endeavor to make the rural-route system a success. Prior to the establishment of these routes the farmer had to depend on his local weekly paper for his news, with an occasional stale weekly put out by some of the daily newspapers, the news in each case being not only meager but otherwise of little value. Scarcely any attention was being given then by the newspapers to the publication of market reports, which was and would have been of the greatest importance to the farmer.

It was then and had for years prior been the practice of the cattle, hog, sheep, horse, and mule buyers to travel through the country, and in the absence of news to the farmer as to the daily fluctuation of the market, pick up such stock often almost at his own price. The same was true of the buyer of grain, vegetables, and other farm products, and especially true of the huckster, who dealt in eggs, butter, chickens, etc.

HELP OF NEWSPAPERS.

These conditions have been changed, and mainly through the foresight of the publishers of well-conducted newspapers, who not only sought rural subscriptions but made it a point to use one or more of the best men on their staff to give full and correct daily reports of the markets, not only of the city where the papers were published but by daily telegraphic reports from Chicago, St. Louis, and other cities, indicating prices of farm products and the trend of the market.

It is our firm belief that in this respect the establishment of rural routes has materially benefited the farmer, and all well-conducted daily newspapers throughout the country have rendered substantial aid in this great work.

In addition, progressive daily newspapers have devoted at least a full page one day each week, known as the farmer's page, edited by competent writers, to enlighten the farmer in the best methods of cultivation.

Does Congress desire to encourage or cripple this work? It can encourage it by being fair to the daily newspaper. It can cripple it by adding to the burden of the publishers.

It may be claimed that 50 cents per annum added by Congress to an increase of the postal rates will not be much of an addition to the subscription price of the paper. It will, however, be that much. It is not so much the amount as the seeming indifference to the interest of the farmer that will hurt.

INCREASE IN COST OF PRINT PAPER.

It is well known that there has been an enormous increase in the cost of white paper. All well-conducted newspapers endeavor to secure a net subscription price equal to the cost of white print paper and postage. They do not, as a rule, seek more than that; they aim to meet all of the other enormous expenses, which, too, have been largely increased, out of the receipts from advertising. A great many of the daily newspapers have already increased their subscription prices somewhat, but by no means sufficient to meet the increased expenses yet to follow. Many others have not made any increase, hoping rather that something would develop to obviate the necessity for any great increase in price. By the refusal of the Print Paper Trust to carry out its agreement with the Federal Trade Commission it is made clear that still greater advances in the price of white paper is certain to take place. The contracts of newspapers for white paper, as a rule, expire either on the 1st of January or July of each year. Some expired on the 1st of July, 1917; many more will expire on the 1st of January, 1918. Surely Congress does not want to help add to the burden of newspapers by increasing the postal rate in a zone of 300 miles when the rate of 1 cent per pound, as shown, is amply sufficient to meet the expense incurred by the department.

M'KELLAR AMENDMENT A SOLUTION.

The adoption of Senator McKELLAR'S amendment to H. R. 4280, referred to the Senate Finance Committee on the 22d day of June, is, in our judgment, on proper lines. It may be deemed wise to make some changes in the rate on zones 4 to 8, inclusive, and it may even be considered advisable to eliminate one or more of the last zones, or add other zones. Certain it is that the zone system is the one and only one equitable method for the fixing of postal rates, and the one that will produce the greatest amount of revenue to the department and cover such publications as those so greatly favored in the past by causing them to pay their rightful portions toward enabling the department to meet at least a portion of its annual deficit.

WILL BRING INCREASED REVENUE.

The Senate committee's action in favor of the flat advance of one quarter of a cent per pound will, it is estimated, add to the receipts of the department approximately $3,000,000 per annum, while the war-profit tax of 5 per cent on newspapers and magazines will bring in $7,500,000 additional per annum.

The honorable Assistant Postmaster General has given an estimate indicating that the provision of Senator McKELLAR'S amendment will add approximately $12,616,470 to the receipts of last year, thus giving the Government, through the Post Office Department, an excess in receipts of $616,471 over the combined increase that will be derived under the Senate committee's proposal in favor of a flat advance in postal rates and the war-profit tax of 5 per cent combined.

And yet, through the adoption of Senator McKELLAR'S amendment, the Government will not only establish a system of postal rates that will furnish the greater amount of additional revenue but will fix the rate upon the one and only equitable basis that can be or has been devised. It will cause those who derive the greatest benefit to pay their equitable portion of the cost of the service rendered and relieve those who are clearly bearing their full share of the burden from any increase in rates except in zones where such advance is or should be made to meet the costs of the service rendered on their behalf.

AMERICAN NEWSPAPER PUBLISHERS' ASSOCIATION.

The American Newspaper Publishers' Association, composed of more than 500 publishers of daily newspapers in the United States, at its annual session in New York in April last, apprehended that an advance in letter postage would call for an advance of the rate on second-class matter, and after proper consideration of the subject, declared by unanimous vote in favor of the zone system, and appointed a legislative committee with instructions to govern itself accordingly in their presentation of the matter to Congress.

It appears that this committee, composed of capable men, did not follow the instructions given by the association, as expressed in the unanimous action of the large annual meeting of its membership, but was pursuaded that the publishers of newspapers should cooperate with the publishers of magazines, trade papers, and other periodicals in an endeavor to defeat an advance or change of any kind in the postal rates. To the extent that this committee acted in this manner in conjunction with the publishers of magazines, trade papers, and so forth, it did not represent the American Newspaper Publishers' Association.

FAVORED ZONE AND FAIRNESS TO GOVERNMENT.

The great body of American newspaper publishers in the expression of their wishes respecting postal rates wanted to be entirely fair to the Government. They wanted to do what fairness and equity demands of them as good citizens, and if, as they believed, an advance in rates on second-class matter should be found necessary, they were ready to support the advance, but they urged that the advance be made under the zone system and in a form and on a basis that would, in an equitable way, meet the situation.

They believed, as we have in this paper already shown, that the postage of 1 cent per pound now being paid would be sufficient to meet the costs to the Government of carrying newspapers within a 300-mile zone. They believed that the deficit in the Post Office Department was due largely to inadequate rates of postage on second-class matter carried for distances embraced in the fourth to the eighth zones, and that the rate covering these zones should be advanced to meet the cost incurred by the Government in rendering the service.

Members of the committee who appeared at the Senate committee hearing, as the representatives of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, had been directed by a unanimous vote of that association to advocate the adoption of the zone system.

The association realized that something should be done to get rid of at least a portion of the large annual deficit of the Post Office Department, and that this result could not be reached in an equitable way by an advance of the existing flat rate. The association never for a moment thought that its committee would signify its approval of a continuance of the flat-rate plan, or an inadequate and improper advance of rates under it.

The association knew that the flat-rate plan had utterly failed to meet the expenses of the department incurred in the transportation of second-class mail matter, and also knew that a large proportion of the deficit of the Post Office Department was due to the use of that plan; the association also knew that a large portion of the deficit was attributable mainly to the immense volume of magazines, periodicals, and trade papers, carried for long distances at the "flat rate" far below the actual cost of transportation.

The association knew that a plan under which the Government was receiving only $1 for 100 pounds for carrying second-class matter two and three thousand miles, and for the transportation of which the Government was paying the railroads from five to seven dollars per hundred pounds, was utterly unsuited to meet the existing situation. The association, therefore, favored its abandonment and the adoption of a plan or system whereby a reasonable and equitable adjustment could be made and the department relieved of at least a portion of its annual deficit.

DID NOT SUPPOSE COMMITTEE WOULD DISREGARD INSTRUCTIONS.

Never for a moment did any portion of the large membership of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association assume that its committee would enter into any arrangement or understanding with the publishers of magazines, periodicals, and trade papers whereby the association should be made to stand before Congress and the people of the United States in favor of the continuance of a system that was annually causing a deficit of fifty million or more to the department.

It never occurred to the newspaper publishers that members of its committee would even by silence acquiesce in a demand or suggestion from the publishers of magazines, periodicals, and trade papers for a continuance of the ruinous "flat-rate" plan.

The association felt that an advance would have to come to meet the large deficiency, and that it should and could only be met in an equitable way through the adoption of the zone plan and the establishment of rates under it in keeping with the cost of transportation paid by the Government.

The newspaper publishers' committee fully understood this, and yet, yielding to the importunities of magazine, trade-paper, and periodical publishers, this committee by its silence permitted the Senate committee to assume that the American Newspaper Publishers' Association was willing to assent to the continuance of a system which it by its previous action had unanimously condemned.

Members of the newspaper publishers' committee, realizing that they had not represented the expressed wish of the association, frankly admitted the fact, and advised other members of the association who were in Washington at the time to proceed with their desire to secure the adoption of the zone system, in favor of which the American Newspaper Publishers' Association had so emphatically declared.

This is in part why the undersigned are seeking to accomplish that result.

NEWSPAPER PUBLISHERS UNDERSTAND SITUATION.

Intelligent publishers of newspapers all know that the Post Office Department is confronted with a large annual deficit.

They know to what this deficit is mainly attributable.

They realize that something should be done to meet the situation. They believe the zone plan will.

They are ready to do their part under it.

The undersigned therefore are urging the adoption of the zone as the only feasible and equitable plan yet conceived to produce the desired result.

We realize that the Government has no right to subsidize either the publishers of newspapers or of magazines, periodicals, and trade papers. We feel that the Government has no right to render a service to either at an annual loss of millions of dollars.

The Government, through an act of Congress and the wise administration of the act by the Post Office Department, has succeeded in securing contracts for the transportation of mails at a reasonable price. All that Congress should do, and all that the publishers of newspapers are asking it to do, is to give them a basis of rates on second-class mail matter in keeping with the cost the Government may incur in the transportation of newspapers under these contracts.

The newspapers will be content with rates made on that basis, and the publishers of magazines, trade papers, and periodicals, who have for years been the beneficiaries of the present unjust and indefensible "flat-rate" system and have at the expense of the Government grown enormously rich under it, assuredly have no right to ask for anything else.

SOUTHERN NEWSPAPERS FAVOR ZONE PLAN.

It is in this connection quite proper to suggest that the Southern Newspaper Publishers' Association, composed of 105 of the leading daily newspapers of the South, and many of whom are also members of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, at its annual convention held at Asheville, N. C., July 10, 1917, also, by unanimous vote, adopted a strong resolution urging the enactment of the zone system, and appointed three of the undersigned as members of a committee to present the views of the association to Congress.

The Asheville convention also, in the same resolution, unanimously declared that the proposed profit or war tax of 5 per cent on the net revenue of newspapers was in the nature of a penalty, that it was unfair and discriminatory, and insisted in lieu that newspapers should be taxed in the same manner as taxes were levied on other lines of business.

It is therefore the duty and privilege of members of this committee to convey to the Senate and House of Representatives the unanimously expressed view of this association in favor of the zone system as contemplated under the McKellar amendment and the rejection of the 5 per cent profit or war-tax provision contained in the pending bill.

NEWSPAPERS NOT ABSOLVED FROM INCREASED RATE.

The adoption of the zone system by no means absolves the daily newspapers from increase in the postal rates. There are many, in fact a large majority, of the daily newspapers who have a circulation far beyond the third zone; in fact, even beyond the eighth and last zone, who would cheerfully pay any advance of the rates in these zones, because they believe it their duty to bear their equitable share in support of the Government.

Take, for example, the case of the Nashville Banner. It has no inconsiderable circulation beyond the 300-mile zone. The States of Arkansas, Texas, Oklahoma, Missouri, California, Arizona, and New Mexico have within their borders a large number of Tennesseeans, who have a longing for their old home and want, at least, to know what is going on in their State. This newspaper, located at the capital city of Tennessee, not unmindful of this sentiment, inaugurated many years ago a plan of having a reliable correspondent in practically every county seat in the State of Tennessee. It is the duty of these correspondents to keep the Banner advised of all current happenings in their county and neighborhoods worthy of being printed. Other Tennessee newspapers have followed in the wake of the Banner. The desire to hear from home is felt also, of course, by the large number of Tennesseeans who spend their winters in Florida and California and at the Gulf ports, and also those who go to Colorado for their health, as well as others who go to the eastern seashore resorts, to the lakes of Wisconsin and Michigan, and other places during the summer months.

MUST PAY THEIR SHARE UNDER INCREASED ZONE RATE.

The Banner, along with other newspapers, has a considerable circulation which goes to its foreign advertisers located in the West, East, and the North, far beyond the 300-mile zone. These advertisers are entitled to the Banner. They want and have a right to see that their advertisements appear in proper form and at the proper time. The Banner also exchanges with many of the leading newspapers of the country, so that these several matters give the paper a circulation of considerable proportion, upon which it must pay the increased rate fixed beyond the 300-mile zone, and what is here said of the Banner in this respect applies to practically all other daily newspapers of the country, although perhaps not in all cases to the same extent.

Mention of this is made to show that the daily newspapers in advocating the zone system with the 300-mile limit left at 1 cent per pound are not actuated alone by selfish aims, but by a desire to secure justice; and a readiness to accept a plan by which the publishers of daily newspapers, as well as the publishers of magazines, trade papers, and periodicals, may all be made to bear their rightful share of the expenses incurred by the Department for their benefit.

The zone system is not new. It is now and has been for a half century in use by the railroads in the establishment of fares on passenger trains, the railroads fixing their rates of passenger fares, in the main, on the basis of the distance passengers wish to travel.

The Government in the etablishment of the Parcel Post System very wisely established the zone system, and through it has accomplished splendid results for the masses engaged in agriculture, as well as the merchants and those with whom they transact business through the parcel post as their medium, and it does seem that what is equitable and fair to the farmer and the merchant should be good enough for the newspapers, the magazines, and the general public.

RATES IN CANADA AND BY EXPRESS.

Reverting to the matter of allowing the 1 cent per pound rate for a zone of 300 miles to stand, it will not be amiss to state that the Government of Canada has established for daily newspapers a postal rate not exceeding 50 cents per 100 pounds on any distance within the Dominion, with a rate of 25 cents per 100 pounds for distances under 50 miles.

Also, that all of the express companies in the United States, on December 15, 1915, established and filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission tariffs providing that "when no wagon service is rendered, either in receipt or delivery, and special mail or newspaper trains are not used, the rate shall be one-half cent per pound for each company carrying."

This fits the case of the newspapers, and would in nearly all sections of the country permit newspapers to be shipped by express for 1,000 or more miles at a rate of 50 cents per 100 pounds, and the only reason why this rate has not been made available to a greater extent by the newspapers is that it does not make the rural-route service as available or desirable as the regular service by mail, and also because, generally speaking, the newspapers prefer, as far as practicable, to give their patronage to the Government. If driven to it by the action of Congress, many papers will be forced, to a much greater extent, to give their patronage to the express companies.

We desire in this connection to correct the impression that newspapers are favored by being allowed, free of postage, access by mail to the rural routes in the counties where the papers are published. The law does not apply to daily newspapers, but alone to weekly papers published in the county. The daily papers pay full second-class postal rates on all papers they send by mail to rural routes and to all other subscribers located in the counties where the daily papers are being published.

NEWSPAPERS AND THE WAR.

An effort has been made, even in congressional debate, to make it appear that the newspapers of the country are largely responsible for this country's entrance into the war, and that they should be heavily taxed to help meet the expenses incident to the war. It has been even charged that a considerable number of the larger newspapers of the country were subsidized to induce them to create a sentiment in favor of war. We know nothing as to the truth of these allegations. It may be that munition manufacturers, Wall Street, or Lombard Street have used money for that purpose; or it may be, as has been suggested, that a distinguished British lord, who owns a number of leading daily newspapers in England and other portions of Europe, has gotten a grip on one or more of the leading newspapers of this country. We certainly hope, for the honor of American journalism, that these allegations have no foundation.

We know that a large majority of the American newspapers favored war, and we must assume that they were honest in their declaration. The newspapers of the country were not all, however, for war. Many of them, controlled by able and loyal American citizens, deplored war and hoped that it might be averted. They at least said nothing in favor of war, but when the Congress of the United States declared that war existed these men burned their bridges behind them, declaring it to be their purpose to support Congress and the administration in all things designed to bring the war to a successful conclusion.

ALL PAPERS SUPPORTING GOVERNMENT.

All of the newspapers of this country, the latter class as well as the former, have since that declaration by Congress loyally and energetically supported the President and Congress in all matters designed to bring the war to a speedy and successful end. They have labored earnestly and anxiously to this end. Nothing has been left unwritten or undone to rally the masses to the support of the Government.

Take the daily issues of practically every newspaper published in the United States and it will be found that fully 80 per cent of the reading space has been devoted to news relating to the war and at least 70 per cent of the 80 per cent has been devoted to the promotion of every plan suggested by the authorities in Washington to aid in its successful prosecution.

Take every phase of the question, beginning with the necessary legislation by Congress, and the newspapers have been found loyal and active in aid of the Government.

The movement to secure volunteers for the Navy and Regular Army, the registration of eligibles for enlistment in the Army under the selective-draft act, subscriptions to the liberty-loan bonds, contributions to the American Red Cross—in fact, any and all matters that would be helpful to the Government in this crisis—have had the active support of the newspapers of the country.

LOYAL WITHOUT MONEY AND WITHOUT PRICE.

England, it is said, spent something over $50,000,000 in advertising its loans and in its appeals for recruits to its army. The Dominion of Canada is said to have devoted $15,000,000 to a like purpose, but no man can point in any direction to show that the newspapers of this country have been paid a farthing by the Government for the great work they have done nor asked the Government to pay anything for that work.

On the other hand, the columns of the newspapers of this country have been filled to overflowing in earnest and anxious endeavors to promote the interests of this country in the prosecution of the war, and for which they have neither asked nor received a farthing of compensation in any form.

It is inconceivable, in the light of the public record made by the newspapers of this country, that the Congress of the United States should wish for any reason to inflict a penalty or burden upon them. There could certainly be no better evidence given of the patriotic endeavor of the newspapers to give active support to the Government and aid, as far as possible, in having the war brought to a speedy and successful conclusion than what they have done up to the present time.

NO DESIRE TO ATTACK MAGAZINES.

It is not our wish in dealing with this matter to attack the publishers of magazines, trade papers, and periodicals who are doing a good work in their lines. An advocacy of the zone plan does not mean an attack on such publishers. It simply means that the zone system is the best and only equitable basis to govern in fixing rates on second-class matter.

This zone system applies to daily newspapers, as well as to magazines and trade papers. It fixes the same rate for both. The only reason why the magazines will pay more under this system is because they are not paying their proportion under the flat-rate plan. The newspapers and magazines under the zone system will pay precisely the same rate—the only difference being that the transportation of magazines, over such longer distances and in such larger quantities, will require those publishers to pay a larger sum to the Government to meet the cost of transporting the large volume of their publications carried over the longer distances.

The present flat-rate plan, which the publishers of magazines insist upon having continued, is so patently unjust to the Government that it seems incredible these gentlemen should have the temerity to insist upon its continuance.

ILLUSTRATIONS BY COMPARISON.

Take a zone of 300 miles, for example, within which the daily newspapers have their principal circulation, and the average rate paid to the railroads within that zone costs the Government 48 cents per 100 pounds. The rate of 1 cent per pound now paid by the newspapers gives the Government $1 per 100 pounds, leaving a surplus of profit of 52 cents per 100 pounds to the Government.

Take zone 7, for example, of 1,800 miles, in which the magazines, trade papers, and periodicals circulate largely, and the average transportation within that zone costs the Government $4.45\frac{9}{10}$ per 100 pounds. The flat rate of 1 cent per pound now paid by the magazines, trade papers, and other periodicals gives the Government only $1 per 100 pounds, creating a loss of $3.45\frac{9}{10}$ per 100 pounds to the Government.

Is there any fairness or even common honesty back of a proposition like this? Why should the Congress of the United States wish to continue a plan that will cause a loss to the Government of fifty or more million dollars annually?

STARTLING EXAMPLES.

A more startling example will be found in the following illustration: The distance from Nashville to Columbia, Tenn., is approximately 40 miles. The United States Government charges the Nashville newspapers $1 per 100 pounds to carry the papers from Nashville to Columbia. The cost of transportation paid by the Government to the Louisville & Nashville Railway Co. is $17\frac{1}{2}$ cents per 100 pounds, leaving the Government a surplus or profit of $82\frac{1}{2}$ cents per 100 pounds with which to meet overhead charges, and so forth.

The distance from New York to San Francisco is 3,300 miles. The United States Government charges the publishers of magazines, and so forth, under the flat-rate plan only $1 per 100 pounds for carrying their publications from New York, Philadelphia, or Boston to San Francisco. It costs the Government approximately $7.399 per 100 pounds to carry these publications to California, thus creating a net loss to the Government of $6.399 per 100 pounds.

Is it any wonder, in the light of these facts, that the Post Office Department is having a deficit of fifty or more million dollars annually? What is to be said of a plan or system that demands $1 per 100 pounds for carrying newspapers a distance of 40 miles, and at the same time permits magazine publishers to carry their publications for a distance of 3,300 miles at the same price?

There is really only one equitable manner of adjustment in dealing with this question, and that is the application of the zone system on the lines indicated in Senator McKELLAR'S amendment, and the present Congress should, now that the question is up for consideration, promptly adjust the matter in that way.

SPECIAL 5 PER CENT WAR TAX UNJUST AND DISCRIMINATORY.

Section 1106 of the bill pending in the Senate provides—

That in addition to the taxes under existing law and under this act there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid, for the calendar year 1917 and each calendar year thereafter, upon the net income of every individual, corporation, partnership, or association arising from the publication of newspapers, magazines, or periodicals, entitled to be entered as second-class mail matter (whether or not so entered), a tax of 5 per cent of the amount of such net income in excess of $4,000.

The effort to levy a special tax on the publishers of newspapers is apparently based on the assumption that the publishers who have availed themselves of the second-class postal rate are receiving large benefits therefrom at the expense of the Government and should therefore have levied upon them an extraordinary or special tax not placed upon other lines of industry or business.

Speaking for the publishers of daily newspapers, we earnestly protest against this view not only because the proposed tax is discriminatory and unfair but because the apparent reason assigned for its application to the daily newspapers is without warrant or justification.

While it is true that the daily newspapers of the country have been entered as "mail matter of the second class" and have paid postage on that basis, it is entirely erroneous to assume that the great body of the daily newspapers of the country (a half dozen of the large metropolitan dailies alone excepted) have had any gratuities or benefits conferred upon them by the Government through which a loss of revenue has been inflicted on the Post Office Department. On the contrary, as indicated on many pages of this address, newspapers have paid to the department not only what is equal to the cost of transportation, but sufficient in excess of that cost to help the department meet an equitable portion of the overhead expenses incurred on their account.

We therefore urge that section 1106 of the bill be stricken out or so amended as to exempt publishers of daily newspapers from its operation.

RESULT THAT WILL FOLLOW ADOPTION OF COURSE SUGGESTED.

The adoption of this course, along with the adoption of the zone system under the McKellar amendment, will leave the newspapers of the country—

First. To continue the payment of the present rate of postage within the 300-mile zone.

Second. To pay such advance in the postal rate as may by the adoption of the zone system beyond the 300-mile limit be established.

Third. To continue to pay the income tax hitherto paid by the newspapers under existing law.

Fourth. To pay a profit or war income tax on the basis that such tax shall be made applicable to all other lines of business.

This we submit as fair and equitable and will in that way without discrimination cause the newspapers of the country to furnish their just proportion of the money needed, not only to aid in the prosecution of the war, but to help meet other current expenditures of the Government.

Respectfully submitted.

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 15, 1917.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, what is the pending question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 44, at the top of the page, the committee proposes to strike out of the House text the following words in lines 1, 2, and 3: "(b) a tax equivalent to 6 per cent of the amount paid for the transportation of property by express companies consigned from one point in the United States to another" and to insert "a tax of 1 cent for each 25 cents, or fraction thereof, paid to any person, corporation, partnership, or association, engaged in the business of transporting parcels or packages by express over regular routes between fixed terminals, for the transportation of any package, parcel, or shipment by express from one point in the United States to another."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it was requested that this amendment should go over to be considered in connection with the imposition of a tax upon parcel-post packages found at page 71 of the bill. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] desired to discuss this matter at some length. He is out of the Chamber. I suppose the only way to proceed with it is either for myself to take time to discuss the amendment until he arrives or to suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is willing to submit a unanimous-consent request to have it passed over.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want to have the amendment passed over. I want to take up the amendments just as we have passed over them and to dispose of them as we reach them. Therefore I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harding	Martin	Shields
Bankhead	Hardwick	Myers	Simmons
Beckham	Hollis	Nelson	Smith, Mich.
Borah	Jones, Wash.	Newlands	Smoot
Brady	Kellogg	Norris	Sterling
Calder	Kendrick	Overman	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Page	Swanson
Culberson	King	Pittman	Thompson
Curtis	Kirby	Poindexter	Trammell
Dillingham	Knox	Pomerene	Underwood
Fletcher	La Follette	Reed	Vardaman
France	McCumber	Saulsbury	Weeks
Gronna	McKellar	Shafroth	Williams
Hale	McNary	Sheppard

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. My colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] is temporarily absent from the Chamber on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is, on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee on top of page 44 of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment of the committee passed over will be read.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over is, on page 50, line 14, after "SEC. 600," to strike out the following:

That there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid—

(a) Upon all automobiles, automobile trucks, automobile wagons, and motorcycles, and automobile, motorcycle, or bicycle tires (including inner tubes) sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer a tax equivalent to 5 per cent of the price for which so sold: Provided, That from the tax which otherwise would be imposed upon a manufacturer, producer, or importer of automobiles, automobile trucks, automobile wagons, or motorcycles there shall be deducted an amount equivalent to 5 per cent of the amount paid for the tires, including inner tubes, on such vehicles by such manufacturer, producer, or importer; and.

And insert:

(a) That on the day this act takes effect, and thereafter on July 1 in each year, and also at the time of the original purchase of a new automobile or motorcycle by a user, if on any other date than July 1, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid, upon the use of automobiles and motorcycles not used exclusively for business, an excise tax at basic rates as follows: Motorcycles, $2.50; automobiles the original listed retail price of which is not over $500, $5; original listed retail price over $500 and not over $750, $7.50; original listed retail price over $750 and not over $1,000, $10; and for each further increase of $500 or fractional part thereof of original listed retail price, an additional tax of $5.

In the case of a tax imposed at the time of the original purchase of a new automobile or motorcycle on any other date than July 1 the amount to be paid shall be the same number of twelfths of the amount of the tax as the number of calendar months, including the month of sale, remaining prior to the following July 1.

The tax payable in any year shall be reduced by 10 per cent of its basic amount for each 12 months elapsed since the original sale of the automobile or motorcycle by the manufacturer or importer, but in no case shall it be reduced to less than 50 per cent of such basic amount.

Mr. BRADY. In line 8, page 51, I move to strike out "$500" and insert "$600." I do this for the reason that I believe it will be beneficial to those who purchase machines of smaller value. I think that minimum should be raised from $500 to $600 and the amount of the tax left there just as it is, fixed at the sum of $5.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 51, in the committee amendment, line 8, strike out "$500" and in lieu insert "$600."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not believe the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho should be adopted. The amendment, as I understand it, is simply to allow one automobile in the United States to come in under the $5 rate instead of the following bracket. The committee began with $500 and increased in steps of $250 on cheap cars. If we adopt this amendment we might as well adopt other amendments in the different brackets to take care of some other particular automobile that may fall just over some other dividing line. I believe that the division made by the committee is a proper one, and it is made taking no automobile into consideration. As to whether the tax ought to be assessed in some other manner, as a flat tax upon the actual cost of the machine, that is another question, but if you are going to use the bracket system I believe the brackets provided for by the committee are the proper ones.

If the amendment of the Senator from Idaho is adopted and you raise the first bracket to $600, then the next bracket will be only between $600 and $750, or a step of only $150, and the other steps on low-priced cars in the bill are $250, the latter part of the amendment provides, "or fractional part thereof of original listed retail price, an additional tax of $5"; that is, for each further increase of $500 over and above $1,000. We might want to change that and make it $600, but I believe, as I stated, that the committee amendment, if we are going to use the bracket system, is just as good a division as is possible to be had; and I hope the amendment of the Senator from Idaho to the amendment of the committee will not be adopted.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, there would be no serious injury done if we did change the brackets on some of the larger-priced machines. I am perfectly willing that the amount taken off of the minimum price shall be distributed among the higher-priced machines. I believe that this tax should be paid by those who are most able to pay it. There are thousands and thousands of people in the United States who are using a $600 machine where there are only a very few who are using a $6,000 machine. The man who is using a $6,000 machine can pay the extra 50 cents very much more easily than the man who is purchasing a $600 machine, and it does not need to disturb the bill in any manner. We can leave it as it is, for that matter, and 50 cents on that one item is not going to make any particular difference in this great bill.

The Senator says it would be inconsistent to change the minimum from $500 to $600; that it might disturb the bill. I think it would be no more inconsistent than the manner in which we are attempting to tax the machines after they are purchased, as shown by lines 19 and 23, to which I expect to offer an amendment. That paragraph reads:

> The tax payable in any year shall be reduced by 10 per cent of its basic amount for each 12 months elapsed since the original sale of the automobile or motorcycle by the manufacturer or importer, but in no case shall it be reduced to less than 50 per cent of such basic amount.

In other words, a man who uses a machine 10 years is required under this law to pay a tax of 50 per cent of the original purchase price; and anyone who knows anything about the use of automobiles knows that no machine is worth anything near as much at the end of 5 years, to say nothing about the lapse of 10 years, as 50 per cent of its original cost. I think if we are going to permit an item like that to stand it would not be at all inconsistent to give the people of the country who are able to buy only a $600 machine the advantage of the small amount of 50 per cent per annum on the tax they have to pay.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Idaho to the fact that this is a straight 1 per cent tax in substance upon the price at which the machine is purchased, as near as the bracket graduated plan can obtain. The man who buys an automobile for $500 pays a tax of $5 a year. The man who buys an automobile for $6,000 pays a $60-a-year tax. There can not be anything fairer than the tax imposed in the bill, because of the fact that the $500-automobile owner can pay the $5 tax just as well as the man who pays a tax on a $6,000 automobile.

Mr. BRADY. I can not agree with the Senator as to that.

Mr. SMOOT. Anyone who is the owner of an automobile at all is not going to be overburdened by paying $5 a year for that privilege. If he can not pay $5 a year for the privilege of owning an automobile he should not be running an automobile with gasoline at 22 and 25 cents and as high as 30 cents a gallon.

Mr. BRADY. But the Senator does not seem to take into consideration that the man who is running at least a $600 automobile is taxed by the bill on almost everything from the cradle to the grave, while the man who has a large income is taxed simply on his excess profits.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. BRADY. I am speaking of the excess profits tax.

Mr. SMOOT. That is only one tax that a man who runs a $6,000 automobile pays. He pays his war-profits tax, he pays his income tax, and he pays the normal tax. The Senator from Georgia complained this morning that there were some of the taxes imposed upon business men as high as 80 per cent of all their profits. Of course that was an exaggerated statement made to him by one of his constituents. People may think they are paying all sorts of taxes, but I will say to the Senator that they are just beginning to pay taxes, and now is not the time to begin to quarrel about a tax of $1 a year upon an automobile.

Mr. BRADY. I fully agree with the Senator that we are just beginning the new system of paying taxes; but, on the other hand, so long as I stand on the floor of the Senate and we are enacting tax laws, I intend to do something for the man who does not have an excess income and who has a right to have a $600 automobile placed within his reach. I am not, however, going to insist upon the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if a man does not have an excess income, he does not have to pay any tax under this bill or under any other bill of which I know.

Now, I want to refer to the other part of the bill to which the Senator says he is going to offer an amendment—the provision on page 51, beginning in line 19, down to and including line 23, which reads:

> The tax payable in any year shall be reduced by 10 per cent of its basic amount for each 12 months elapsed since the original sale of the automobile or motorcycle by the manufacturer or importer, but in no case shall it be reduced to less than 50 per cent of such basic amount.

Mr. President, the Senator took the position that if an automobile was used 10 years, under this provision the basis of the tax would be reduced only one-half. There are very few automobiles used longer than 5 years, though there are some, of course, which may be used for 10 years; but an automobile 5 years old, if continued to be run, uses the streets just the same as an automobile that has just been purchased, and it uses just as much gasoline, if it is run as many miles as the new machine would be run. The length of an automobile's life is about five years. We thought that as to second-hand machines, which may be purchased for quarter of their original cost, which may be purchased frequently for $250, we would only tax them $5.

So, Mr. President, the purchaser of an automobile which has been in use for over five years, no matter what power its engines may develop, does not generally pay more than $500 for it, and in very many cases he pays much less than that. It seems to me that the provision, as reported by the committee, in the bill is just as liberal as anyone could possibly ask. I think everybody will admit that by use a machine deteriorates at least 10 per cent a year; but the committee thought that for five years 10 per cent each year, which is 50 per cent on its original cost, was enough to allow when imposing the tax upon automobiles.

Mr. BRADY. Was it the thought of the committee that the man would sell the machine at the end of five years to get rid of the tax?

Mr. SMOOT. Even if he does not sell it, if he has used the machine five years and still continues to use it, why should he not pay one-half the tax he paid at the time he purchased the car. In other words, if his original tax is $10 a year, and he has used that machine for five years, his tax will be 50 per cent less than $10, which is $5, the same as the lowest rate which is provided for in the bill.

Mr. BRADY. Does the Senator think that if a man owned a span of horses which he had purchased for $500 and he had used them for 10 years he ought to be assessed at 50 per cent of what he paid for them?

Mr. SMOOT. If the horses are worth it; yes.

Mr. BRADY. But if they are not worth it, what then?

Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. BRADY. That same rule applies here.

Mr. SMOOT. But this is not a tax on property, it is an excise tax. This is a tax upon the purchase price of the machine; not the machine itself. The maker does not pay the tax; it is the person who buys the machine; it is for the privilege of running the machine.

Mr. BRADY. I want to ask the Senator if he thinks that a tax system that is not based on an actual cash valuation is a fair tax system?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the Senator wants me to answer as to how I differentiate between this tax and the case which he has presented for a tax upon horses, I will say that if we imposed a tax upon the owner of a farm for the privilege of using two horses that cost $500, and if he continues to use those horses we would give him, say, a certain exemption in the tax every year because of the fact that a horse would not be as able, perhaps, to do the work the third year as he would in the second year. It is not, however, the value of the horse we are proposing to tax; it is the privilege of using the horse for whatever purpose the farmer or anyone who may own the horse may want. So it is with the automobile; it is for the privilege of running it that the tax is imposed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from Idaho to the fact that this is not a tax on a thing, but it is an excise tax; a tax for doing the thing and not a tax levied upon values. I think the Senator will agree with me that an automobile which can run at all and that can be used at all will certainly perform more than one-half of the service when it is 5 years old that it would when it was new. If an automobile after five years could give but half of the service that it gave when first purchased that automobile would be too expensive a thing to have around. No one would attempt to use it at all; it would go into the scrap heap. Any automobile that is used at all will perform more than 50 per cent of the service which it would perform when new. This being an excise tax, a tax on use, it certainly can not be unreasonable to say that the use of an automobile if used at all shall be not less in value at any time than one-half the value of its use when new.

The Senator may buy a piece of furniture for his parlor and the day after he has purchased it he could not sell it for 50 per cent of its value; after six months he could not sell it for much over 33⅓ per cent of its value at any kind of a sale; and yet he could get the same service and the same comfort out of it for 5 or 10 years. If the tax is levied not upon the article itself but as an excise tax upon the use of the article, you can not complain when there is an ample reduction made.

There is one other matter which the Senator ought to consider. The Senator speaks of saving 50 cents for the poor people who drive cheap automobiles. I will say to him that that means 2 gallons of gasoline, according to the average price over the United States. It is so picayunish, it seems to me, that the person who operates an automobile at all will not consider that he has saved a great deal in saving 50 cents a year. If he feels that this sum is such a hardship that he should save it, he can shorten 1 trip out of the 365 he takes during the year 10 miles and save the equivalent of this tax.

Mr. BRADY. It means 40 miles to the average man, and many of these people would enjoy very much to have a 40-mile ride on Sunday afternoon after working all the week.

I want to ask the Senator from North Dakota a question before he takes his seat, and that is, Does he not think it would be more just and fair to require an excise tax to be paid on the actual valuation of the automobile in the year in which it is being used?

Mr. McCUMBER. No, Mr. President. I am using an automobile now that is giving me all of the service that it gave me when I first purchased it five or six years ago, and yet I could not get 10 cents on the dollar of what it cost me at that time. I could not possibly sell it, because there is little demand for an automobile that has been used for five years. However, it gives me the service and, therefore, for the use of it, for the service I am getting, I am willing to pay that tax.

Mr. BRADY. It seems to me that the only fair and equitable way would be to levy an excise tax of 50 cents, say, on a hundred dollars, according to the actual cash value of the property owned.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator should take a trip into Maryland, he would pay the same amount for a license for a 40-horsepower machine which is five years old that he would for a new one; there is no difference whatever, because it is an excise tax—a tax on use. When we have provided for a reduction after a machine has been used, I think we have done all that the user can ask; and certainly he can not complain because possibly he should have been allowed a reduction that would save him 2 gallons of gasoline in a year.

Mr. BRADY. I think he is entitled to have his property assessed at its actual cash valuation.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of some member of the committee about one feature of the tax on automobiles. It is well known that the most expensive automobiles on the market, the ones that are considered the most luxurious and ones affected most by the people who are "in the swim," are foreign automobiles the cost of which runs up high. I know people who have paid as much as $12,000, $13,000, and $14,000 apiece for them. The point I want a little light on is this: Under this provision does the taxpayer have to pay on the American valuation, which is the original price, plus the duty, or does he pay the tax on the price abroad?

Mr. SMOOT. The tax will be imposed upon whatever the machine sells for in this country; that would be whatever the foreign price of it was, if the man purchased in a foreign country, plus the duty and the freight and all the expenses of bringing it to this country.

Mr. KNOX. It should not, then, be made specific, because it is provided here that it shall be levied and paid on "the original listed retail price." Now, "the original listed retail price" on an automobile is what it sells for where it is made. If you put in the words "in the United States"——

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that there is not a foreign-made car that is not listed in the United States and that has not a United States list price.

Mr. KNOX. Then why not say "the original listed retail price in the United States"? I think the matter is open to considerable question.

Mr. SMOOT. I would not object at all to putting those words in; and if the Senator will offer the proposed amendment I am perfectly willing, so far as I am concerned, that it be adopted.

Mr. KNOX. I suggest that that modification be made in the interest of clearness, because I think very serious questions may be raised as to whether "the original listed retail price" does not mean at the place where the car was bought.

Mr. SMOOT. So far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment, because that was exactly the intention of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest that the Senate dispose first of the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. KNOX. I beg pardon; I thought that amendment had been withdrawn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the Chair will put the question on the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania. The question now is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho to strike out "$500" and insert "$600."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KNOX. Now I move the amendment, which is agreeable to the Senator, I believe, to insert the words "in the United States" after the word "price."

Mr. SMOOT. "Original listed retail price in the United States."

Mr. KNOX. To insert the words "in the United States"; yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 51, line 12, after the words "original listed retail price" it is proposed to insert the words "in the United States."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KNOX. I offer another amendment to this section: On line 12, page 51, I move to strike out "$5" at the end of the line and insert "$10," so that the tax on the higher priced machines will be $10 for each increase of $500 in the cost price. I think, Mr. President, that will impose a very moderate tax upon a luxurious pleasure car. This tax applies to no other car save those used for pleasure, and I think that after the $1,000 limit is passed an increase of $10 on each $500 would be very fair taxation. The tax would amount, on a $5,000 car, to $80 a year, which is not an excessive tax for a luxury of that kind.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, does the Senator think that we ought to begin at a thousand dollars and double the tax on a car of that price? If the suggestion of the Senator is followed, it seems to me that the increase ought to apply to cars the price of which is above that of what is ordinarily called the "middle-class car," which is purchased for between $1,000 and $2,000.

Mr. KNOX. I am not tenacious about having the increase apply to the lower priced cars. I would be perfectly satisfied to make the tax $7.50 for cars costing between $1,000 and $3,000, and then $10 additional on each $500 increase over that amount.

Mr. SMOOT. That, I will say to the Senator, would be much better than to have the increased rate apply to all cars above $1,000 in price, which would take in the $1,100 car, the $1,200 car, the $1,500 car—a class of cars that are now very popular indeed.

Mr. KNOX. The car that I want to reach is the expensive, luxurious car which is usually owned by people who can very well afford to pay the tax and who would not object to paying the tax.

Mr. SMOOT. Those above $3,000 in price?

Mr. KNOX. Very well; I would be willing to let the present provision stand as to cars priced up to $3,000, if we increase the tax $10 for every $500 over that.

Mr. SMOOT. All over $3,000.

Mr. KNOX. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to that, if the Senator from North Carolina will agree to it.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is, $10 for each $500 additional value over $3,000?

Mr. KNOX. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think it would be necessary to add another bracket.

Mr. SMOOT. It can not be covered by one bracket.

Mr. SIMMONS. I suggest that the Secretary in stating the amendment add another bracket, after "$10," in line 10, by inserting the words "original listed price over $1,000 and not over $3,000, $30."

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; that would impose a tax of $30 on the $1,500 car.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator is correct.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Chair to allow this section to be passed over for a few minutes until the amendment can be perfected so as to cover just what is intended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, further consideration of the section will be postponed. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over is on page 71, where the committee propose, after line 8, to insert the following:

2. Parcel-post packages——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, that amendment may go over for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over is on page 76, where, after line 3, the committee propose to insert:

7. Bank check, draft, or certificate of deposit not drawing interest, or order for the payment of any sum of money, drawn upon or issued by any bank, trust company, or any person or persons, companies, or corporations at sight or on demand, 1 cent.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think there are a number of Senators who are interested in that amendment, and I ask the Senator if he will not allow it to go over?

Mr. GRONNA. I will also ask the Senator if he will be willing to let that amendment go over?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am willing to let that go over not for the day but for the present, and I suggest, if there are absent Senators who are interested in this particular amendment, that they be sent for. The amendment was reached yesterday and went over until to-day. If we let all of these matters go over, we will be out of work. I will let it go over temporarily.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made to a general postponement; so the amendment will be laid aside temporarily. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The SECRETARY. On page 80, all of Title X was passed over, as well as new Title IX, on page 85.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not see any reason why we can not consider Title X, the amendment on page 80, section 1000. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] asked that it go over. He is now in the Chamber.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, what is the amendment to which the Senator refers?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state it.

The SECRETARY. On page 78, "Title IX.—War estate tax." The committee proposed to strike out all of section 900.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I myself do not understand why the committee struck this title out. It seems to me——

Mr. SIMMONS. I was mistaken about the section. I thought the Secretary referred to section 1000, on page 80, which relates to coffee and tea. That was the section the Senator from Nebraska asked to have passed over.

Mr. NORRIS. I asked that the war estate tax go over, as well as the coffee and tea tax. As I understand, the pending question is to strike out Title IX, on page 78.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the pending question.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield the floor, if the Senator desires to speak on the subject.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not so desire, but I wish to take up section 1000 instead of section 900, because the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] desires to submit some remarks on section 900, and I have sent for him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to section 900 being passed over temporarily? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask that section 1000 be taken up.

Mr. NORRIS. I think there are a number of Senators who want to discuss that feature of the bill, and I think it had better go over.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not able to understand the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator from North Carolina that the tax provided for in section 1000 on coffee and tea, according to my understanding, will lead to considerable debate.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Massachusetts is now in the Chamber, and I withdraw my request to take up section 1000 and will ask to return to section 900.

Mr. SMOOT. Let us get the automobile section concluded.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to return to page 51, to the provision relating to the tax on automobiles in order to perfect the amendment which was suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. I will ask the Senator from Pennsylvania, in the first place, if it would not be better to include the words "in the United States" in line 8, after the word "price," instead of in line 12, after the word "price," because the same words "original listed retail price" are found in all the other brackets?

Mr. KNOX. I think that will make it better English.

Mr. SMOOT. If used in the first bracket, it will apply to all.

Mr. KNOX. Yes; and will make better English.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 51, line 8, after the word "price," it is proposed to insert the words "in the United States."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Utah to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the vote by which the same words were inserted in line 12, after the word "price," be reconsidered, and that that amendment be disagreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the vote whereby the amendment referred to was adopted will be reconsidered, and the amendment will be considered as rejected.

Mr. SMOOT. In line 12, after the word "price," I move to insert "up to and including the original listed retail price of $3,000"; and, at end of line, to insert "; and for each further increase of $500 or fractional part thereof of original listed retail value, an additional tax of $10."

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I will inquire of the Senator from Utah why he proposes to depart from the term "price," which is used in the preceding bracket, and employ the word "value." Would it not be better to use the word "price" instead of "value"?

Mr. SMOOT. Perhaps it would. I will look at the amendment again.

Mr. NELSON. Because it might lead to a conflict. In all the brackets preceding the word "price" is used, while in the amendment now offered it is proposed to make it a matter of value. I think that is a mistake, and that it should be "price."

Mr. SMOOT. Perhaps it would be better to repeat the word used in the preceding brackets, as the Senator suggests, and I ask that the change be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be so modified. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Utah as modified to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, is the committee amendment still pending?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is still pending.

Mr. KIRBY. Is it proposed to ask that it be voted on this afternoon?

Mr. SIMMONS. The automobile section?

Mr. KIRBY. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the intention.

Mr. KIRBY. Then, Mr. President, I desire to say that I believe the House provision of the bill should be retained rather than the amendment proposed by the Senate committee. It is a matter of common knowledge that the automobile industry to-day is more highly profitable than any other branch of manufacturing in the United States except that of munitions. The remarkable growth of this industry is also well known and the fact that the price has been maintained for the automobiles manufactured. The price is now at as high a level, probably, as the traffic will bear, and, as I have said, great profits have been made in the manufacture and sale of automobiles.

I believe it is time that we gave the manufacturers an opportunity to pay some of the tax which the Government needs and must have for the conduct of its affairs. I know the tax will be more easily collected from the manufacturer than it will be if it is distributed amongst the users and purchasers of automobiles and required to be paid by them; and it will certainly be more just under the conditions as they exist. It would give the manufacturer, at least, an opportunity to divide up on the cost of the automobile, or be required to pay it when his business is able to stand it. He might be able, of course, to pass it on to the consumer; but he would have an opportunity, at least, to pay it.

I think the House provision is more nearly just and reasonable, it is more easily enforced, and it would produce as much or more revenue. I do not think, therefore, that the committee amendment should prevail.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think if the Senator had read the testimony that was taken before the Finance Committee he would change his views as to the justice of any levy being made upon the wholesale price of the automobile as it comes from the factory. That matter was fully considered by the committee. The majority of the committee would have preferred so to do if it could have been done without great injustice and inequalities.

There are some of the manufacturers who are making enormous profits. There are others that are making very little. Many of them did not make anything last year. Now, especially in the case of those machines that are sold for less than a thousand dollars, there is a great deal of competition in the effort to sell their machines, and even a very small increase in the price of one makes it impossible to compete against another of the same class. The makers of one machine might carry the tax on to the purchaser, and makers of another class might not be able to do so.

It is well known that probably the Ford Co. make a greater percentage of gain or profits in their business than any of the other companies. They could stand this tax and still make their millions every year. They could carry the small tax on each machine to the purchaser. Many of the other companies that are selling cheap machines at the present time and attempting to compete with the Ford could not stand the tax. They could not pass it on without loss of business. They would have to go out of business, and their business would go to the Ford Manufacturing Co. Every company that could pass the tax on to the final purchaser would do so. The others would suffer.

This matter was fully discussed upon full hearing before the committee, and while I did not favor the method adopted in the collection of taxes but thought it would be more fair to levy the tax upon the motor power, the same as is done in most of the States, I still know that the method adopted is a very fair one, and I do not think it ought to be interfered with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the committee as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I ask that section 900 be now considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 78 the committee proposes to strike out all of Title IX—War estate tax, or all of section 900.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, yesterday when we reached this part of the bill it was passed over at the request of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], who said he thought it desirable that some statement should be made on behalf of the committee in regard to their action on the war estate or inheritance tax.

Mr. President, the inheritance tax, broadly speaking, is not an economically sound tax, because it impairs capital; and taxes should rest upon earnings and not take part of the capital, which is the source of all earnings and all taxation. But the justice, the convenience, and the certainty of the inheritance tax has led to its being adopted by every nation and by every State in the Union, so that it is not worth while to discuss the general economical feature.

The reasons which caused the committee to strike this provision from the bill are simple and seem to the committee conclusive.

It is to be remembered that the provisions of this bill are temporary in their nature. This is headed a war estate tax. The assumption is, and the provision of the bill is, that it will expire on the conclusion of the war. As we have a permanent inheritance tax, the result of that would be that the estates of those persons, comparatively few in number, who died during the war period would be very heavily taxed and would have to bear a large additional tax, whereas the estates of those persons who had the good fortune to outlive the period of the war would escape it entirely. It therefore seemed to the committee that it was unjust.

The amount to be raised by this tax is trifling. The estimate is that it will yield only $6,000,000 the first year.

The most conclusive reason of all, however, to the minds of the committee was that there was a strong protest from the States in regard to any further addition to the inheritance tax. The governors of the New England States united in regard to it, and we have heard from other States in the same way. They pointed out that the extension of direct taxes which has necessarily taken place has invaded the region of taxation of which the States hitherto have had almost complete command, and this is one of the taxes on which nearly all the States very largely rely; and they objected very much to any further increase of the national taxes upon inheritances. The committee felt that this was a sound objection. The amount of revenue to be gained was trifling, and the opposition coming from the States, the committee felt, should be regarded.

For the reasons that I have mentioned, the committee struck the provision from the bill. They felt that the amount of revenue to be gained by it was out of all proportion to the inequalities that would be caused and to the trouble that it would also bring to the States in levying their own taxation.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, all forms of taxation are more or less burdensome; and at a time when the ingenuity of man is stretched to its utmost to find new things to tax, it can not be expected that we will be successful in finding anything as to which all people will agree that the tax is just.

Some of the reasons given by the Senator from Massachusetts on behalf of the committee appeal to me, although I think the same reasons could be given as to almost everything else in the bill under consideration. It is true that it is a war measure and that the tax provided for will cease when the war ends. That is true also of the other taxes in the bill. The man who has a large income during the war will have to pay a heavier tax than he would if he were fortunate enough to have the same income either before the war or after it. There are States that tax incomes now, and yet we have an income tax, and propose to increase it by this bill. As the Senator from Massachusetts has said, most States have inheritance taxes. The particular provision that the committee desire to strike out only increases those taxes. The law will remain after the war ends unless it is repealed. It is only the increase that will cease. So, as far as the principle is concerned, Mr. President, it is immaterial whether this amendment is agreed to or whether the tax remains in the bill. So it seems to me that that reason falls to the ground.

We are already taxing estates regardless of this law, and until the law is repealed we will continue to do so after the war is over. If this provision remains in the bill there will be only an increase of this kind of taxes that must be paid during the war. There is no change in the principle involved; and States that object to a Federal estate tax on principle, because it is a subject of State taxation, will find and have already found that the Federal Government has been resorting to that kind of tax before this amendment was proposed to the general law. That is all that the House provision is—a tax in addition to the tax now imposed by law. The committee amendment seeks to strike out that provision for an additional tax, but permits the law to remain as it is now.

Another reason given by the Senator is that the amount raised will be small; and that is true, the way we are considering things now. It does not go into the billions, but goes into the millions, and raises quite a number of millions of dollars. It will save the necessity of raising that much in any other direction.

Mr. President, an inheritance tax or an estate tax, such as this, is the most easily administered tax that there is. To collect the additional revenue that will be collected under the language that the committee amendment proposes to strike out will not require the expenditure on the part of the Government of the United States of one penny. The machinery for its collection is already in existence, and an inheritance tax is being collected under the existing law; so that there is no expense involved in getting this additional revenue.

Another reason, it seems to me, why the language ought to remain in the bill, is that this kind of a tax is the least burdensome of any tax that ever has been devised by the ingenuity of man. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] suggests that the person taxed will not get an opportunity to complain. Well, that is one relief; but, as a matter of fact, the persons from whom it is taken have no reason to complain. In fact, it is not taken from any living person. If a man accumulates a large amount of property under the laws of the country, and the laws of the country permit him, as they do in all civilized countries, to devise it, to bequeath it to those who shall live after him, and provide by law how it shall descend in case he makes no such disposition in his lifetime, it goes, ninety-nine times out of one hundred, to people who have not been instrumental in its production.

A man gets an estate by virtue of the death of the owner of the estate. It is a gift. It comes to him without his having produced it, without his having made any effort to accumulate it. It is like finding it; and the Government says, then, "In that case we will tax it, and we will take a portion of it." The Government under whose laws the estate was accumulated and built up will, when the man who has accumulated it and built it up is through with it and can not use it longer, take a small percentage in the way of taxation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. KING. I do not think anybody can seriously object to the propositions announced by the Senator from Nebraska, certainly on the academic and theoretical aspect of the case; but is it not a fact—and I ask this in good faith of the Senator—that a large number of the States, and indeed most of the States, are now more and more resorting to the inheritance tax as a source of income?

If I may be pardoned a personal allusion, the legislature of my State recently met, and the question of taxation was a very important one, because there was a deficit that had to be met, and very great expenditures were demanded for the next two years because of the growing needs of the State. It was anticipated by some that there probably might be a war in which this Government would participate, and it was felt that if we went to war the income tax and the corporation tax or excess-profits tax would be the principal sources of revenue.

There was quite a disposition to levy a State income tax. I took the liberty of suggesting to the members of the legislature that, in my opinion, it was unwise for the States to impose an income tax; I thought that that matter ought to be remitted to the Federal Government.

Then the question of the inheritance tax was taken into account. We have an inheritance tax in our State, but the legislature felt that they would draw more heavily in the future upon inheritance taxes as a source of revenue than in the past. I know that at a number of meetings of the tax experts, in which various States have been represented, the question has been very carefully considered, and the consensus of opinion has been that the States of the Union more and more would resort to the inheritance tax as a source of State revenue; that they wanted to appropriate that, and to keep the Federal Government out of that field.

In my judgment these large estates should pay heavy taxes. When a person dies leaving an estate of considerable magnitude, that estate ought to pay a very heavy tax for the maintenance of the State government. But now in view of the important activities of the Federal Government, and the fact that it is using as a primary source of revenue the income tax, does not the Senator think it would be wise to leave to the States an open and clear field with respect to dealing with inheritance taxes?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator's argument is forceful; it has lots of meat in it and reason for it; but as I said before, in answer to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who used the same argument——

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, I did not hear the Senator from Massachusetts, and I beg pardon if I have trespassed upon the ground which he could cover so much more ably than I.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am very glad to have the Senator's reenforcement, because he has stated the point better than I could.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Utah need make no apologies, I am sure. But, Mr. President, if the theory advocated by the Senator be correct, then we ought not to be satisfied with striking out this language, but we ought to repeal the law by which we are already compelling estates to pay taxes to the Federal Government. That is the law now. This provision only increases it during the war. It seems to me that in principle that is an answer to the Senator's argument.

That we ought to leave something for the States to tax, of course, appeals to me. In time of peace it would appeal to me much more strongly than it does now, because we are in a very peculiar position in the way of taxation. The question of taxation is an important one for the States, and it always has been one of the great, important functions of government, one of the most difficult, and one that is entitled to the most careful consideration of legislatures of all kinds, because it is a serious proposition. It is recognized that by taxation you can kill an industry or a business and that you can be unfair in the method of taxation. The Federal Government is now searching for things to tax; and if, during the war, it does tax estates, which will in no case be a hardship to anyone, it seems to me that no objection would come from the various States.

Let us look at the provision that the amendment strikes out. In the first place, it is a progressive tax. It starts with a tax of one-half of 1 per cent on the amount of the net estate not in excess of $50,000. There is a provision in the general law for finding what the net estate is. It takes out all expenses, and so forth. As I say, it then imposes a tax of one-half of 1 per cent on the amount of such net estate not in excess of $50,000. Personally, if I were drawing the law I would give an exemption of $50,000 to start with; but the committee have only taxed the first $50,000 one-half of 1 per cent. Then they impose a tax of 1 per cent on the amount by which the net estate exceeds $50,000 and does not exceed $150,000. That would be one-half of 1 per cent on the first $50,000 and 1 per cent on the next $100,000. So it goes up until it reaches 15 per cent of the amount by which the net estate exceeds $15,000,000; and the tax next below that in the progression is 10 per cent of the amount by which the net estate exceeds $11,000,000 and does not exceed $15,000,000. Mr. President, I submit that in no case would that tax be a hardship.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, may I correct the Senator in one respect?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. This is an additional tax, in addition to the tax already levied by law.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I understand that. I stated that.

Mr. McCUMBER. Therefore the sums that the Senator gives will not be the real tax, but they must be added to the tax provided under existing law.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that. The Senator is correct. Perhaps he was not here when I began. I made the statement that these taxes were in addition to the taxes imposed under existing law, but the amounts I have stated are the only amounts that are involved in this amendment. So I still contend that I am absolutely correct in saying that the amounts I have mentioned as being the taxes that would be levied under this bill are the only amounts involved. If this provision of the House bill is adopted, the taxes would be increased by the amounts that I have named, and, as I said before, that increase, that tax coming upon estates would only have the effect of diminishing gifts that people otherwise would receive. With an estate, for instance, of $16,000,000 the 15 per cent would only be reckoned or computed on $1,000,000—only on the excess.

As I stated, the first tax is one-half of 1 per cent, the next is 1 per cent, then 1½ per cent, 2 per cent, 2½ per cent, 3 per cent, 3½ per cent, 4 per cent, 5 per cent, 7 per cent, 10 per cent, and 15 per cent. In no case would the money taken by this tax come from anyone who, as a matter of legal right, without a statute of his country, would be entitled to it. It is only because the law of the country gives a man the right to bequeath his estate that he possesses that right. It is only because we have a law that permits a person to inherit an estate that he could get any of it. The Government has a legal right to take it all when a man is dead and therefore through with it. So I say that the tax comes without any hardship, and that is one of the things we want to be looking for now—to get a tax that will not be a hardship.

Although I believe the estimate is that only $6,000,000 will be collected under this provision, it can be collected easier than any other tax in this bill; and it seems to me that we ought not to strike out that language.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I can not agree with the Senator from Nebraska that at a man's death the State has either a legal or an equitable right to confiscate all that he has earned during his lifetime. It may have the power, but it has no legal right under any law in the United States, and it has no moral right to do so.

Nearly all of the savings of any man of family are savings that he has been helped to build up by the assistance of wife and children, either by their labor or economy. In many instances the children have helped him to make that inheritance. It is the result partly of their labor, the result partly of the labor of the wife, the result partly of her rigid economy. Now, the parents are laboring and saving for their children. They have a right to do that. The children have a right to inherit from the parents; and therefore, on the assumption that these persons who are the recipients of the estate of a deceased person have no moral or legal right to their estate, I say that I must disagree with the Senator.

There is another feature: If the Senator will take up any book of statistics and observe how enormously the taxes of States have been increasing for the last 10 or 15 years, he will be appalled; and States are wondering to-day where they will get the revenues to take care of the demands for the next year.

I was informed the other day by the Senator from New York that in certain sections of that city, good sections, too, buildings will not rent for the amount of taxes. The taxes have become so heavy to supply the actual sanitary needs of our large cities and their government that they are overburdening every source of revenue. So, too, the legislatures must look for some additional sources of revenue other than a tax upon land and a tax upon personal property. The States say they ought to be entitled to have one source of revenue that is theirs exclusively. That one source is the estates tax.

I agree with the Senator from Utah and also with the Senator from Nebraska that this source of revenue ought to be left with the States. I also agree that on the same principle we ought not to levy any estate taxes whatever, as we have already done under existing law, but because we have done an injustice to the States by levying a certain tax upon estates that ought to be left entirely with a State, that ought not to justify us in adding to that injustice by an additional levy.

I would vote at any time to repeal the national tax upon estates and leave that tax entirely for the support of the States. I hope we will do that soon and that we will draw a line of demarcation where we will say there is something that is sacred to the rights of the State which the Government will not attempt to exact taxes from. The State can not levy a tax upon imports. The Government can support itself almost entirely from imports if it sees fit to do so. The State being deprived of that right, the Government ought to concede to it, and it was intended in the adoption of the Constitution that the Government should concede to the States most of the other sources for raising revenues by taxation.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, I do not desire to take the time of the Senate to add anything to what has been said by the Senator from Massachusetts or the Senator from Utah or the Senator from North Dakota regarding the rights of the States and the feeling that exists within the States, but I do desire as an expression of the State of Vermont to send to the desk and to have the Secretary read a resolution adopted by the legislature of that State upon this subject at its last session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read. The Chair hears no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE STATE OF VERMONT.

Joint resolution relating to Federal and State taxation of incomes and inheritances.

Whereas the Federal Government is encroaching more and more upon the sources of revenue heretofore reserved for purposes of State taxation; and

Whereas this encroachment is felt particularly in the case of income and inheritance taxes, both of which forms of taxes are in danger of being dried up as sources of State revenue; and

Whereas in both these fields of taxation there exists a line which separates the taxable units that equitably and logically may be left solely to State taxation from the units logically belonging to the broader Federal jurisdiction; and

Whereas the establishment of some reasonable line of division, giving to the States sole taxing authority below such line, and to the Federal Government sole taxing authority above such line, would cure much of the trouble existing because of conflict of jurisdiction between States; would relieve the tension between Federal and State Governments; would result in great economy in the administration of the tax; and would relieve the growing dissatisfaction on the part of the taxpayer resulting from irritating and expensive duplication of accounts and reports and double taxation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives, That we respectfully urge action by the Congress of the United States and the legislatures of the several States, to the effect that the Federal income and inheritance-tax law be amended so that upon acceptance and compliance by the different States, the Federal tax will be withdrawn upon incomes and estates which reasonably and logically should be reserved for purposes of State revenue; and be it further

Resolved, That concerted and uniform action on the part of the States is of such vital importance that we recommend the holding of a congress of the States to consider the subject of Federal encroachment upon State sources of revenue, with the object of adopting and urging upon the Congress of the United States a definite policy in the segregation of State and Federal revenue; and be it further

Resolved, That the governor of the State be authorized to appoint one or more delegates to represent Vermont at such conference; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forthwith transmitted by the secretary of the senate to the President of the Senate of the United States and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States; a copy hereof to each Member of Congress from the State of Vermont, and a copy to the president of the senate and to the speaker of the house of representatives of each of the State legislatures in session at this time.

ROGER W. HULBURD,
President of the Senate.
STANLEY C. WILSON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Approved March 23, 1917.

HORACE F. GRAHAM, Governor.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I think the committee did wisely in striking out the House provision in regard to an estate tax. I remember giving a little attention to this subject when the present law was under consideration here in the Senate. I found that at that time, according to my recollection now, there were 43 States of the Union that had inheritance and estate taxes, either a direct inheritance or a collateral inheritance tax, or both direct and collateral inheritance taxes.

It seems quite appropriate that if there is any tax at all on estates or inheritances it should be left to the States, and for this one reason, that it is within the power of the State, and within the power of the State alone, to regulate the transmission of devolution of the property of a decedent, whether that property be left by will or whether the owner of the property dies intestate; and, as was so well said by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], many of the States now, on account of municipal taxation, county taxation, and State taxation, are driven to extremities, as it were, in the matter of finding subjects for taxation in order that the current State expenses may be met. I think it is not necessary, and it should not be necessary, for the Federal Government to resort to this one subject of taxation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Does the Senator remember the maximum inheritance tax of the States?

Mr. STERLING. I do not. I merely recall now, as I said, that the number of States imposing such a tax at that time was 43.

Mr. JONES of Washington. My recollection is that quite a number of States levy the tax, but that the tax is very small.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to the joint resolution from the State of Vermont which the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] had read at the Secretary's desk. If that policy should be carried out it would not only be the estate taxes that we now have on the statute books that would be repealed, but we would not have a provision in this bill providing for an income tax, and we would have to repeal the income tax we now have. It not only complains about the estate taxes and inheritance taxes, but the income taxes as well. I am not speaking of it with any disfavor, either. The proposition advocated, as I understand it, in the joint resolution of the Legislature of Vermont is to have a line drawn by which a part of the income taxes shall be kept by the State and a part taken by the Federal Government and a part of the inheritance taxes kept by the State and a part taken by the Government.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I ought to say, if the Senator please, that this resolution was adopted by the legislature before the beginning of the war between the United States and Germany. The legislature evidently had in mind what all the people of Vermont had in mind when they ratified the constitutional amendment giving power to the General Government to impose income taxes. It was upon the representation and with the general understanding that the tax was to be imposed when it was needed for use in times of great national emergencies and not as a part of the fiscal system of the United States in time of peace. That was the thought evidently in the mind of the legislature when they included the income tax in the resolution in connection with the inheritance tax.

Mr. NORRIS. The resolution was approved by the governor on the 23d day of March, 1917. At that time everybody in the United States knew that the United States was going to get into this war very shortly.

Mr. President, I rather commend the plan that they propose. I myself believe it would be a better plan than to give to the States the sole authority to levy an estate tax or an inheritance tax and to the Federal Government the sole authority to levy an income tax. It seems to me, as I understand the proposition of the Vermont Legislature, that they want to establish a line, which they do not attempt to name in the resolution, and provide that above that line in inheritance and estate and income taxes the Federal Government shall get all and below that line the States shall get all, and to apply that to inheritance taxes and income taxes alike.

Mr. President, I do not know why anyone should single out the estate tax and say that it is peculiarly a subject for State jurisdiction and then take the income tax and say that it is peculiarly a subject for Federal jurisdiction. Under the Constitution there is not any question but what the Federal Government can levy an income tax and also an inheritance tax. We have already levied both and both are now in existence. So if there be any principle involved of that kind it has already been violated by the Government and is being violated every day, and it is not proposed to repeal the law that does violate it.

I presume the members of the Legislature of Vermont had in mind a sort of understanding that should be reached between the Federal Government and the various States that would provide one set of machinery by which the estate taxes and income taxes could be collected, and that on an arbitrary line drawn applying to both inheritance and income taxes the Federal Government should collect on one side and the State on the other, each one fixing the rate that would apply, and then save overhead expenses by having it collected through the instrumentality of one set of officers.

As I said, I am not sure but what that would be a fair solution, and would be right. But, Mr. President, the State of Utah, the State of Vermont, and all the other States mentioned by Senators have been hunting for something to tax; and it is not right to say that there is any agreement that the Federal Government shall not tax inheritances, because, as I said, we are doing it now under existing law. This is only a provision that during the war we shall tax a little bit heavier in that regard.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I ask the Senator if he recalls the date when the Federal Government began the taxation of inheritances?

Mr. NORRIS. I can not recall the date, but I can give it to the Senator. I have it here; I think it is in the bill. This is an amendment to an act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes, approved September 8, 1916. I take it that that is the date.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. The thought I had in mind was that until comparatively recent time the Federal Government has kept its hands off from that as a subject of taxation. It is a source of revenue to the States which has been enjoyed for a long time and which they have come to claim, as they think, legitimately as their own.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not belittling their claim, either. I remember when the Underwood tariff law was under consideration I offered an amendment to the inheritance-tax amendment to tax all inheritances, and I provided in it that 90 per cent of the amount that any estate or inheritance should pay should be deducted if the person who had to pay it produced a receipt showing that he had paid that amount of tax in the State to the State authorities. In other words, that where the State did levy a tax 90 per cent of it should go to the State and not be collected over again by the Federal Government.

Mr. STERLING. I will state to the Senator that of all the States 43 of them two years ago had provided for an inheritance tax, and there would be very little left under the general proposition made by the Senator to go to the General Government.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; it would not have been very much, but the effect of it would have been to tax large estates the same all over the United States, so that there would not have been any discrimination.

I am not trying, Mr. President, to deprive the State of its just right to raise money by taxation, but I am contending here that as a war measure this is one of the least hardships that is contained in the bill. I am willing to permit the States to resort, and to give them the exclusive right to resort, to an inheritance tax. I would be glad if the States and the Federal Government could do what the State of Vermont wants to do and desires to do to draw an arbitrary line and say to the Federal Government, "You stay on one side and the State on the other."

But, Mr. President, we have not any such arbitrary line. We are now taxing estates, and no one would feel this increase. We are in as desperate a condition as any State can be in trying to find something to tax. That is the reason, it seems to me, why this language ought to stay in the bill.

I realize that what I can say will probably have no effect and that the Members of the Senate will perhaps follow the committee, which has taken the other view of it; but it did not seem to me that I ought to let this matter pass without an opportunity, at least, to express the opinion I have briefly tried to express.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 80, after line 6, to strike out:

TITLE X.—WAR CUSTOMS DUTIES AND WAR TAX ON COFFEE AND TEA.

SEC. 1000. That on and after the day following the passage of this act there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all articles when imported from any foreign country into the United States, or into any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila), if such articles are now dutiable by law, a duty of 10 per cent ad valorem in addition to the existing duty (whether ad valorem or specific); and if not now dutiable by law, a duty of 10 per cent ad valorem. The duties imposed by this section shall be levied, collected, and paid under the provisions of existing law. This section shall not apply to (a) gold or silver bullion; (b) coins of gold, silver, copper, or other metal; (c) printing paper admitted free of duty under paragraph 567 of section 1 of the act entitled "An act to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," approved October 3, 1913, as amended; (d) ores of the platinum metals, and platinum, unmanufactured or in ingots, bars, plates, sheets, wire, sponge, or scrap, and vases, retorts, and other apparatus, vessels, and parts thereof, composed of platinum for chemical uses; (e) nitrate of soda; (f) mechanical ground wood pulp, chemical wood pulp, unbleached or bleached, and rag pulp; or (g) articles specified in paragraphs 397, 398, 404, 424, 428, 451, 499, 556, 582, and 642 of section 1 of such act of October 3, 1913.

And this section shall not apply to the following-named articles, to wit:

First. Any animal imported by a citizen of the United States, specially for breeding purposes, whether intended to be used by the importer himself or for sale for such purposes.

Second. Horses, mules, and asses straying across the boundary line into any foreign country, or driven across such boundary line by the owner for temporary pasturage purposes only, together with their offspring;

Third. Animals brought into the United States temporarily for a period not exceeding six months, for the purpose of breeding, exhibition, or competition for prizes offered by any agricultural, polo, or racing association; but a bond shall be given in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury; also teams of animals, including their harness and tackle, and the wagons or other vehicles actually owned by persons emigrating from foreign countries to the United States with their families, and in actual use for the purpose of such emigration, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and wild animals intended for exhibition in zoological collections for scientific and educational purposes, and not for sale or profit;

Fourth. Books, engravings, photographs, etchings, bound or unbound, maps and charts imported by authority or for the use of the United States or for the use of the Library of Congress;

Fifth. Books, libraries, usual and reasonable furniture, and similar household effects of persons or families from foreign countries, all the foregoing if actually used abroad by them not less than one year, and not intended for any other person or persons, nor for sale;

Sixth. Newspapers and periodicals; but the term "periodicals" as herein used shall be understood to embrace only unbound or paper-covered publications issued within six months of the time of entry, devoted to current literature of the day, or containing current literature as a predominant feature, and issued regularly at stated periods, as weekly, monthly, or quarterly, and bearing the date of issue;

Seventh. Articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, when returned after having been exported, without having been advanced in value or improved in condition by any process of manufacture or other means; steel boxes, casks, barrels, carboys, bags, and other containers or coverings of American manufacture exported filled with American products, or exported empty and returned filled with foreign products, including shooks and staves when returned as barrels or boxes; also quicksilver flasks or bottles, iron or steel drums of either domestic or foreign manufacture, used for the shipment of acids, or other chemicals, which shall have been actually exported from the United States; but proof of the identity of such articles shall be made, under general regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, but the exemption of bags from duty shall apply only to such domestic bags as may be imported by the exporter thereof, and if any such articles are subject to internal-revenue tax at the time of exportation, such tax shall be proved to have been paid before exportation and not refunded; photographic dry plates or films of American manufacture (except moving-picture films), exposed abroad, whether developed or not, and films from moving-picture machines, light struck or otherwise damaged, or worn out, so as to be unsuitable for any other purpose than the recovery of the constituent materials, provided the basic films are of American manufacture, but proof of the identity of such articles shall be made under general regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury; articles exported from the United States for repairs;

Eighth. Professional books, implements, instruments, and tools of trade, occupation, or employment in the actual possession of persons emigrating to the United States owned and used by them abroad; but this exemption shall not be construed to include machinery or other articles imported for use in any manufacturing establishment, or for any other person or persons, or for sale, nor shall it be construed to include theatrical scenery, properties, and apparel; but such articles brought by proprietors or managers of theatrical exhibitions arriving from abroad, for temporary use by them in such exhibitions, and not for any other person, and not for sale, and which have been used by them abroad, shall be admitted free of duty under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; but bonds shall be given for the payment to the United States of such duties as may be imposed by law upon any and all such articles as shall not be exported within six months after such importation: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, extend such period for a further term of six months in case application shall be made therefor.

SEC. 1001. That upon all coffee or tea which on the day this act is passed is held by a retailer (who does not sell coffee or tea at wholesale) in a quantity in excess of 50 pounds in the case of tea and 200 pounds in the case of coffee, or by any other person, corporation, partnership, or association in any quantity, and which is intended for sale, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a tax of 1 cent per pound in the case of coffee and of 2 cents per pound in the case of tea.

Such tax shall be assessed, collected, and paid in the same manner as provided in section 1102 in the case of additional taxes upon articles upon which the tax imposed by existing law has been paid.

And in lieu to insert:

TITLE IX.—WAR EXCISE TAX ON COFFEE, TEA, COCOA, AND SUGAR.

SEC. 900. That there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid—

(a) Upon all coffee or substitutes therefor produced or imported, and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, a tax of 2 cents per pound, to be paid by the producer or importer;

(b) Upon all tea produced or imported, and sold, or removed for consumption or sale (except impure tea, tea waste, tea siftings or sweepings, for manufacturing purposes in bond, pursuant to the provisions of the act of May 16, 1908), a tax of 5 cents per pound, to be paid by the producer or importer;

(c) Upon all crude cocoa produced or imported, and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, a tax of 3 cents per pound, and upon all prepared or manufactured cocoa and chocolate imported and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, a tax of 5 cents per pound, such taxes to be paid by the producer or importer;

(d) Upon (1) all refined sugar refined or imported, and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, and (2) all sugar manufactured or imported, if suitable for consumption as an article of human food without further refining, and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, a tax of one-half cent per pound, to be paid by the refiner, manufacturer, or importer;

(e) Upon all saccharine or similar products, glucose, grape sugar, sirup of cane juice, and molasses, produced or imported, and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, a tax of $2.50 per pound in the case of saccharine or similar products, one-fourth of a cent per pound in the case of glucose and grape sugar, 1 cent per gallon in the case of molasses (except beet molasses) and sirup of cane juice, testing by polariscope above 40° and not above 56°, and 2 cents per gallon in the case of molasses and sirup of cane juice testing above 56°, such taxes to be paid by the producer or importer.

Upon all articles specified in this section, which on the day this act is enacted are held by a retailer (who does not sell them at wholesale) in a quantity in excess of 200 pounds in the case of coffee or substitutes therefor, 50 pounds in the case of tea, 500 pounds in the case of sugar, 100 pounds in the case of glucose or grape sugar, 50 gallons in the case of molasses or sirups, and 1 pound in the case of saccharine or similar products, or by any other person, corporation, partnership, or association, in any quantity, and which are intended for sale, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid the taxes imposed upon such articles in this section.

Such tax shall be assessed, collected, and paid in the same manner as provided in section 1002 in the case of additional taxes upon articles upon which the tax imposed by existing law has been paid.

Only one tax under this section shall be paid with respect to any article, irrespective of change of form by manufacture or other process.

SEC. 901. That each such manufacturer, producer, refiner, or importer shall make monthly returns under oath to the collector of internal revenue for the district in which is located the principal place of business, containing such information necessary for the assessment of the tax, and at such times and in such manner as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may by regulation prescribe.

Upon the removal from the custody of customs officials of articles subject to a tax imposed by section 900, the tax shall be collected by the collector of customs and deposited as internal-revenue collections under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe.

SEC. 902. That so much of paragraph O of section IV of the act entitled "An act to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," approved October 3, 1913, as authorizes a drawback upon sugar is hereby repealed.

Mr. NORRIS. This amendment strikes out two or three pages relating to the tax on coffee and tea, and in its stead inserts two or three pages levying a tax on coffee and tea and sugar and cocoa. I desire to propound this question to the Chair: If the amendment of the committee is agreed to, will it be in order, when the proper time comes so that individual Senators have the right to offer amendments, to move to strike out the language which this amendment proposes to insert?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the amendment having been agreed to, it will have to be reported to the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I know there is at least one Senator who is opposed to levying any consumption tax, at the present time at any rate, on coffee, tea, sugar, and cocoa, and yet who would not particularly care whether the House provision or the Senate committee provision went into the bill; but an opportunity is desired to vote to strike these things from the bill. If the Chair now holds that no such motion can be made——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But the Chair does not hold any such thing.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I did not understand the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to strike out could be voted upon and could be voted down, and the clause as it came from the House could be stricken out.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, would not a motion to strike out the words "tea, coffee, sugar, and cocoa" be in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. In other words, have we not the right to amend the committee amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Undoubtedly.

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly; but the proposition which I submitted to the Chair was, What would be the status after the amendment was agreed to?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator from Nebraska is laboring under a misapprehension. I have no purpose to ask for a vote this afternoon upon that portion of the bill proposing an excise tax on coffee, tea, sugar, and cocoa. I recognize that there is some difference of opinion with regard to that, and that that will lead to considerable discussion. The matter embraced in section 1000 which I wish acted upon this afternoon relates to the so-called tariff tax imposed in the House bill, the tax of 10 per cent ad valorem upon practically all the articles in the tariff schedules. Coffee and tea are mentioned there separately, because under the provision of the House bill it is proposed to levy a floor tax upon coffee and tea, that floor tax being regulated by the tariff tax contained in the main provisions of the House bill. That is all that is before the Senate in that section. Striking that out does not interfere at all with section 900, which is an entirely independent proposition—a tax upon coffee and tea entirely different from that imposed in the House bill.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Just let me say a word. I agree entirely with the Senator from North Carolina, and when he interrupted I was going to call the attention of the Chair to the fact and was going to make the point of order, which had occurred to me while the Chair was announcing his decision, that striking out the text—and this is important—on page 80, commencing with section 1000, Title X, down to and including line 15, on page 85, is one amendment, and the inserting of Title IX, section 900, and what follows over to section 901, on page 87, is another and a separate amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Entirely.

Mr. NORRIS. The Chair will notice that one refers to coffee and tea, and the other refers to coffee, tea, cocoa, and sugar; one is numbered section 1000 in the print, while the other is numbered section 900; one is Title X and the other is Title IX. That being true, I have no objection to voting on striking that out and doing it now, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. SIMMONS. Title X really is the tariff section of the House bill, and coffee and tea are merely incidents of that.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. Now, I should like to have the Chair's opinion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It depends entirely upon the manner in which the committee amendments are offered. If the committee reported as a separate proposition the amendment to strike out, of course it should simply be put as an amendment to strike out, and the other proposition would be taken up as a second amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, that is all the committee is offering—to strike out that whole section. They are not offering any substitute for it. The next section is an entirely different section.

Mr. NORRIS. That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. SIMMONS. It deals with coffee, tea, and sugar upon a different basis altogether.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That makes the matter perfectly clear.

Mr. NORRIS. That is satisfactory. Let us vote on it.

Mr. CURTIS. Will the Senator from North Carolina then consent that the other section go over until to-morrow?

Mr. SIMMONS. I said that I would not ask to take up the other section this afternoon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reported by the Senate commitee to strike out Title X.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, Mr. President, I ask that Title IX go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment reported by the committee as Title IX will go over. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desire to inquire whether Title X, embracing the administrative provisions, has been read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that that title has been read and agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. Title XI, relating to postage rates, by agreement will be passed over. Title XII relates to income-tax amendments, and there are some amendments in that title, though not all of them, which will provoke some debate.

I desire to ask that section 1204, on page 105, be now taken up. These amendments are merely administrative portions of Title XII.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the committee referred to by the Senator from North Carolina will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Beginning on page 105, the Committee on Finance proposes to insert a new section as follows:

SEC. 1204. (1) That subdivisions (c) and (e) of section 8 of such act of September 8, 1916, are hereby amended to read as follows:

"(c) Guardians, trustees, executors, administrators, receivers, conservators, and all persons, corporations, or associations, acting in any fiduciary capacity, shall make and render a return of the income of the person, trust, or estate for whom or which they act, and be subject to all the provisions of this title which apply to individuals. Such fiduciary shall make oath that he has sufficient knowledge of the affairs of such person, trust, or estate to enable him to make such return and that the same is, to the best of his knowledge and belief, true and correct, and be subject to all the provisions of this title which apply to individuals: Provided, That a return made by one of two or more joint fiduciaries filed in the district where such fiduciary resides, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, shall be a sufficient compliance with the requirements of this paragraph: Provided further, That no return of income not exceeding $3,000 shall be required except as in this title otherwise provided.

"(e) Persons carrying on business in partnership shall be liable for income tax only in their individual capacity, and the share of the profits of the partnership to which any taxable partner would be entitled if the same were divided, whether divided or otherwise, shall be returned for taxation and the tax paid under the provisions of this title: Provided, That from the net distributive interests on which the individual members shall be liable for tax, normal and additional, there shall be excluded their proportionate shares received from interest on the obligations of a State or any political or taxing subdivision thereof, and upon the obligations of the United States and its possessions, and that for the purpose of computing the normal tax there shall be allowed a credit, as provided by section 5, subdivision (b), for their proportionate share of the profits derived from dividends. Such partnership, when requested by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue or any district collector, shall render a correct return of the earnings, profits, and income of the partnership, except income exempt under section 4 of this act, setting forth the item of the gross income and the deductions and credits allowed by this title, and the names and addresses of the individuals who would be entitled to the net earnings, profits, and income, if distributed. A partnership shall have the same privilege of fixing and making returns upon the basis of its own fiscal year as is accorded to corporations under this title. The share of the profits of a partnership to which any taxable partner would be entitled for a fiscal year ending in 1916, or subsequent tax years for which the rates of tax have been or shall be changed by law, shall be returned for taxation and the tax paid under the respective rates applicable to each calendar year in the proportion that the period of each calendar year bears to the full fiscal year."

(2) Subdivision (d) of section 8 of such act of September 8, 1916, is hereby repealed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Before we proceed, I wish to say that I do not understand that these sections are being adopted at this time but merely read.

Mr. LODGE. This is a purely administrative provision.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is a purely administrative section that I desire to get rid of this afternoon, if we can.

Mr. McCUMBER. I would rather that subdivision (e) go over. I think it ought to be compared with other sections of the bill. I want to know before this section is passed on whether partnerships are treated in every respect exactly the same as are corporations. I am doubtful whether this provision does give them the same treatment, and it may need some modification.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let that go over, then, if the Senator desires, and let us go on with the remainder of that section.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is satisfactory.

Mr. SIMMONS. We will leave out subsection (e).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is unable to tell how a part of an amendment can be segregated and allowed to go over when it is one proposition.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Chair holds that that is a necessary part of the whole amendment, of course, his statement is correct.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that the provision applies to all on pages 106 and 107, down to and including line 8, on page 7, and if any part of it goes over, it all ought to go over.

Mr. LODGE. Let me ask the attention of the Chair to section 1204. It begins:

SEC. 1204. (1) That subdivisions (c) and (e) of section 8 of such act of September 8, 1916, are hereby amended to read as follows:

The first amendment amends subdivision (c) of the old law, while the next amendment, which is a wholly separate amendment, amends subdivision (e). They are wholly different; they are intervening subdivisions in the original law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the Secretary, as the Chair thinks proper, has considered each section as an amendment proposed by the committee. If that is not the case, the chairman of the committee will have to indicate the divisions of the amendments proposed by the committee as they are read.

Mr. LODGE. My point was simply that we could amend the subdivisions of the existing law separately.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no doubt about that, if the amendment is proposed as a single amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I was proposing the amendment to subdivision (c) as a separate amendment, but if this is going to lead to any complication, as it seems it will, I will let the whole section go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The entire section will be passed over.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, as to section 1207——

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee a question.

Mr. SIMMONS. Just a moment and I will yield to the Senator. As to section 1206, a Senator has requested that that section go over. I have not the name of the Senator making the request, but I have marked it "Over." Section 1207, I think, is clearly administrative.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if the second subdivision of section 1204 is the one repealing the provision of the law of 1916 for the collection of the income tax at the source?

Mr. SIMMONS. To what section does the Senator refer?

Mr. KELLOGG. The second subdivision of section 1204, on page 107.

Mr. SIMMONS. The latter part of section 1205, on page 109, line 18, which reads:

The provisions of this section relating to the deduction and payment of the tax at the source of income shall only apply—

And so forth.

Mr. SMOOT. That relates to deductions; but I ask the Senator to turn to page 101, section 1201, subdivision (c), in paragraph (2), which reads as follows:

Subdivision (c) of section 5 of such act of September 8, 1916, is hereby repealed.

That relates to information at the source in place of collection at the source, and the paragraph on page 109, to which reference has been made, relates to deductions.

Mr. KELLOGG. I read from page 107:

Subdivision (d) of section 8 of such act of September 8, 1916, is hereby repealed.

Is that the provision for the collection at the source?

Mr. LODGE. That is found on page 101, lines 17 and 18.

Mr. SMOOT. Lines 17 and 18, on page 101, as I have just stated.

Mr. LODGE. That repeals the provision in regard to collection at the source.

Mr. SIMMONS. There is a provision in the section to which the Senator refers relating to collection at the source, but the repealing section is on page 101.

Mr. KELLOGG. Has that been adopted by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. SMOOT. The provision on page 101 has been adopted.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, what provision has been adopted on page 101?

Mr. LODGE. The whole of page 101.

Mr. McCUMBER. When was it adopted?

Mr. LODGE. No; I beg the Senator's pardon. It was not adopted.

Mr. SIMMONS. That was not adopted.

Mr. LODGE. The whole thing was passed over.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is what I understood, because I want to give notice now that on page 101 I shall move to strike out, on lines 12 and 13, that portion in parentheses which reads "(except income and war-profits taxes)," so that the provision will read the same as the old law. I do not want to take that up to-day, because I would have to have a yea-and-nay vote on it, and I do not wish to call for a quorum at this time.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, there have been so many requests about different amendments under this title going over that I am disposed to let it all go over down to section 1208, on page 117, which is purely administrative.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 117, after line 4, to insert:

SEC. 1208. (1) That subdivision (e) of section 13 of such act of September 8, 1916, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(e) All the provisions of this title relating to the tax authorized and required to be deducted and withheld and paid to the officer of the United States Government authorized to receive the same from the income of nonresident alien individuals from sources within the United States shall be made applicable to the tax imposed by subdivision (a) of section 10 upon incomes derived from interest upon bonds and mortgages or deeds of trust or similar obligations of domestic or other resident corporations, joint-stock companies or associations, and insurance companies by nonresident alien firms, copartnerships, companies, corporations, joint-stock companies or associations, and insurance companies, not engaged in business or trade within the United States and not having any office or place of business therein.

(2) Subdivision (f) of section 13 of such act of September 8, 1916, is hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 118, to insert:

SEC. 1209. That section 18 of such act of September 8, 1916, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 18. That any person, corporation, partnership, association, or insurance company, liable to make a return or to supply information required under this title, who refuses or neglects to make such a return or to supply such information at the time or times herein specified in each year, shall be liable, except as otherwise specially provided in this title, to a penalty of not less than $20 nor more than $1,000. Any individual or any officer of any corporation, partnership, association, or insurance company, required by law to make, render, sign, or verify any return or to supply any information, who makes any false or fraudulent return or statement with intent to defeat or evade the assessment required by this title to be made, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be fined not exceeding $2,000 or be imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court, with the costs of prosecution: Provided, That where any tax heretofore due and payable has been duly paid by the taxpayer it shall not be recollected from any withholding agent required to retain it at its source, nor shall any penalty be imposed or collected in such cases from the taxpayer, or such withholding agent whose duty it was to retain it, for failure to return or pay the same, unless such failure was fraudulent and for the purpose of evading payment."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 119, after line 2, to insert:

SEC. 1210. That section 26 of such act of September 8, 1916, as amended by the act entitled "An act to provide increased revenue to defray the expenses of the increased appropriations for the Army and Navy and the extensions of fortifications, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1917, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 26. Every corporation, joint-stock company, or association, or insurance company subject to the tax herein imposed, when required by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, shall render a correct return, duly verified under oath, of its payments of dividends, whether made in cash or its equivalent or in stock, including the names and addresses of stockholders and the number of shares owned by each, and the tax years and the applicable amounts in which such dividends were earned, in such form and manner as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 119, after line 20, to insert:

SEC. 1211. That Title I of such act of September 8, 1916, is hereby amended by adding to Part III five new sections, as follows:

"SEC. 27. That every person, corporation, partnership, or association doing business as a broker on any exchange or board of trade or other similar place of business shall, when required by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, render a correct return duly verified under oath, under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe, showing the names of customers for whom such person, corporation, partnership, or association has transacted any business, with such details as to the profits, losses, or other information which the commissioner may require, as to each of such customers, as will enable the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to determine whether all income tax due on profits or gains of such customers has been paid.

"SEC. 28. That all persons, corporations, partnerships, associations, and insurance companies, in whatever capacity acting, including lessees or mortgagors of real or personal property, trustees acting in any trust capacity, executors, administrators, receivers, conservators, and employers, making payment to another person, corporation, partnership, association, or insurance company, of interest, rent, salaries, wages, premiums, annuities, compensation, remuneration, emoluments, or other fixed or determinable gains, profits, and income (other than payments described in sections 26 and 27), of $800 or more in any taxable year, or, in the case of such payments made by the United States, the officers or employees of the United States having information as to such payments and required to make returns in regard thereto by the regulations hereinafter provided for, are hereby authorized and required to render a true and accurate return to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under such rules and regulations and in such form and manner as may be prescribed by him, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, setting forth the amount of such gains, profits, and income, and the name and address of the recipient of such payment: Provided, That such returns shall be required, regardless of amounts, in the case of payments of interest upon bonds and mortgages or deeds of trust or other similar obligations of corporations, joint-stock companies, associations, and insurance companies, and in the case of collections of items (not payable in the United States) of interest upon the bonds of foreign countries and interest from the bonds and dividends, from the stock of foreign corporations by persons, corporations, partnerships, or associations, undertaking as a matter of business or for profit the collection of foreign payments of such interest or dividends by means of coupons, checks, or bills of exchange.

"When necessary to make effective the provisions of this section the name and address of the recipient of income shall be furnished upon demand of the person, corporation, partnership, association, or insurance company paying the income.

"The provisions of this section shall apply to the calendar year 1917 and each calendar year thereafter.

"SEC. 29. That in assessing income tax the net income embraced in the return shall also be credited with the amount of any excess profits tax imposed by act of Congress and assessed for the same calendar or fiscal year upon the taxpayer.

"SEC. 30. That nothing in section II of the act approved October 3, 1913, entitled 'An act to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes,' or in this title, shall be construed as taxing the income of foreign Governments received from investments in the United States in stocks, bonds, or other domestic securities.

"SEC. 31. That all contracts entered into after the enactment of this amendment by which any person, corporation, partnership, association, or insurance company agrees to pay any portion of the tax imposed by this title upon any other person, corporation, association, or insurance company, or to reimburse such person, corporation, association, or insurance company for any portion of such tax, shall be void, and any person, corporation, partnership, association, or insurance company entering into such a contract shall be subject to a fine of not more than $1,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on the top of page 123 to insert:

SEC. 1212. That any amount heretofore withheld by any withholding agent as required by Title I of such act of September 8, 1916, on account of the tax imposed upon the income of any individual, a citizen or resident of the United States, for the calendar year 1917, shall be released and paid over to such individual, and the entire tax upon the income of such individual for such year shall be assessed and collected in the manner prescribed by such act as amended by this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Title XIII.—General provisions," in section 1302, page 124, line 3, after the word "its," to strike out "passage" and insert "enactment," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 1302. That unless otherwise herein specially provided, this act shall take effect on the day following its enactment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, on page 114 I think in printing the committee amendment three words have been left out. After the word "company" in line 20 on that page there should be inserted the words "shall be deducted."

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, my attention has been called to that. I think it is a clear omission, and I accept the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 114, in the committe amendment, on line 20, after the word "company," it is proposed to insert the words "shall be deducted."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, my attention was diverted just a moment ago. Was section 31, on page 122, read?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; that has just been agreed to.

Mr. KELLOGG. That ought to be considered in connection with the subdivision repealing the provision for collection at the source.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator that after we have acted upon the section relating to information instead of collection at the source, I will consent to reopen this section if it seems to be necessary as a result of our action.

Mr. KELLOGG. Very well.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

EMPLOYMENT OF ADDITIONAL CLERK.

Mr. THOMPSON. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back favorably without amendment Senate resolution 117, and I call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to the report.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The resolution was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ an additional clerk, at the rate of $120 per month, for a period lasting from August 20, 1917, until the end of the present session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, to be paid out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A bill (S. 2805) for the relief of Ralph Parsons; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. DILLINGHAM:

A bill (S. 2806) granting a pension to Kate E. Le Velley; and

A bill (S. 2807) granting an increase of pension to Fanny S. Conline (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MYERS:

A bill (S. 2808) to appropriate money for supplying seed wheat to indigent homesteaders and farmers for sowing in the fall of 1917; to the Committee on Appropriations.

WAR-RISK INSURANCE.

Mr. WATSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2758) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a bureau of war-risk insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR LANE.

Mr CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the memorial addresses on my late colleague, Senator LANE, were set for next Sunday morning at half past 10 o'clock. Some of the Senators who desire to submit remarks on that occasion have notified me that they will not be able to be here, as they will be engaged in preparation for the discussion of the war-revenue bill. Therefore, in order to accommodate them, I ask that the time for those exercises be changed from next Sunday to the 16th of September at the same hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). The notice will be entered.

RECESS.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock p. m., Friday, August 17, 1917) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, August 18, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, August 17, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Be graciously near to us, O Thou Great Spirit, whose eternal energy is everywhere potent. Incline our hearts unto Thee, that our work may be full, complete, in accordance with Thy will, that we may have no regrets for the past, and go forward to meet the future with brave and manly hearts, encouraged by the example of Thy Son, Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, August 14, 1917, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following bill, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 2477. An act to authorize the construction of a building for the use of the Treasury Department.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Arkansas rise?

Mr. WINGO. With the permission of the Speaker of the House, I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], whom I presume for the time being is majority leader de jure as well as de facto, what is the prospect for the Senate catching up with the legislative program so that the House can resume business and clean up what few remaining matters are necessary for it to attend to before final adjournment? Of course, the House has acted with dispatch as well as intelligence all during the session, and, as far as the House action is concerned, Congress could have adjourned some time ago, but the delay is occasioned by the Senate; and what I want to know is what hope is there of the Senate concluding the legislative program within the near future?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I have no information on the subject, and therefore I move that the House adjourn.

ADJOURNMENT.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until Tuesday, August 21, 1917, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, reports on preliminary examination and survey of Little Wicomico River, Va. (H. Doc. No. 336); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed with illustration.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of Savannah River, Ga., from the foot of Kings Island to point 5 miles above (H. Doc. No. 337); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Superintendent of St. Elizabeths Hospital submitting a tentative provision of legislation for insertion in the pending deficiency bill (H. Doc. No. 338); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting copy of the Commission on Navy Yards and Naval Stations with reference to expenses of said commission (H. Doc. No. 339); to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

5. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication of the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission submitting an estimate of appropriation for compensation of two additional commissioners (H. Doc. No. 340); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

6. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication of the Secretary of the Interior submitting an item for inclusion in the pending deficiency bill (H. Doc. No. 341); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

7. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication of the acting president of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia submitting supplemental estimates of appropriations required for the service of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918 (H. Doc. No. 342); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. RAKER: A bill (H. R. 5794) for the protection of desert-land entrywomen who enter the services of the Red Cross with the military or naval forces of the United States in the time of war; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5795) to relieve the owners of mining claims who have been entered into the Red Cross work with the military or naval forces of the United States as nurse or assistant in the Red Cross work from performing assessment work during the term of such service in the said Red Cross work; to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5796) for the relief of homestead entrywomen or settlers who enter the service in the Red Cross with the military or naval forces of the United States in time of war; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. BAER: Resolution (H. Res. 130) to investigate mob violence in Washington, D. C.; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. CRAGO: A bill (H. R. 5797) granting an increase of pension to Jacob Walters; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa: A bill (H. R. 5798) granting a pension to Jennette Hamilton; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions

By Mr. McKINLEY: A bill (H. R. 5799) granting an increase of pension to Mary E. Tryon; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5800) granting an increase of pension to Ella C. Tremble; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5801) granting an increase of pension to James K. P. Weaver; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5802) granting an increase of pension to G. W. Bunyan; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5803) granting an increase of pension to A. G. Daniels; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5804) granting an increase of pension to Melissa A. Danley; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5805) granting an increase of pension to Rebecca Shanks; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5806) granting an increase of pension to John L. Thomas; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5807) for the relief of Henry C. Kurtz; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5808) for the relief of Francis M. Watrous; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5809) for the relief of Jamison Cox; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, August 18, 1917.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, August 15, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED.

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

Mr. MYERS. For my colleague [Mr. WALSH], who is necessarily absent, I introduce a bill and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill (S. 2809) to encourage and promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, potassium, and sodium on the public domain was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. WATSON:

A bill (S. 2811) granting an increase of pension to Thomas J. Wood; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 92) to defer first payments upon homestead entries for lands in the Colville Indian Reservation, Wash.; to the Committee on Public Lands.

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 93) for improving Willapa Harbor and River, Wash.; to the Committee on Commerce.

PICKETING AT THE WHITE HOUSE.

Mr. MYERS. I introduce a bill and ask that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (S. 2810) for the better protection and enforcement of peace and order and the public welfare in the District of Columbia was read by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words about the bill I have just introduced. It is intended for the enactment of better and more adequate legislation to prevent the infamous, outrageous, scandalous, and, I think, almost treasonable actions that have been going on around the White House for months past, which have been a gross insult to the President of the United States and to the people of the United States; I mean the so-called picketing of the White House, branding the President of the United States as comparable to the Kaiser of Germany, the greatest autocrat, the worst despot, the most tyrannical ruler in the world, and a murderer, who has brought upon the world the greatest scourge that has ever been known in the history of all time.

I think the branding of the President of the United States as comparable to the Kaiser of Germany at the present time and under present circumstances, while the President is carrying on his devoted shoulders the great load of our burdens and is making a desperate fight for our rights, is infamous and I think it ought to be stopped. I think the people of the United States are disgusted with these outrageous proceedings. They are an insult, a flagrant insult, to the President of the United States and an insult to the people of the United States. He is our President, and when he is insulted we are insulted. They are an insult to every Senator and Representative who has consistently supported national woman's suffrage, as I have, and I am tired of them. These disgusting proceedings have been going on for months, and if there is no adequate law to stop them, I think there ought to be.

I see in the morning papers that the officials of the District of Columbia announce that these proceedings will be stopped. I hope they may be. The officials have had months to stop this insult to the American people, but have not done so. They have been going on for months past, and they have been stopped periodically, only to be resumed each time with increased offensiveness. If the law is not adequate, plain, and sufficient for this evil, we ought to have more legislation on the subject, because I believe the people of the country are tired of this intolerable nuisance; they are disgusted with it.

I believe the President, in the generosity of his heart, erred when he pardoned some of the women who have been conducting these proceedings, after they had been sentenced to 60 days in the workhouse. I believe they deserved the sentence, and they ought to have been compelled to serve it. While I believe the President in the goodness of his heart erred, I believe it is time for Congress to take action in the matter and to express its disapproval of these proceedings and the women who conduct them.

I for one am not satisfied longer to sit here idly day by day and submit to having the President of the United States insulted with impunity before the people of the country and before all the world. It is a shame and a reproach.

I hope this bill, which has been referred to the Commitee on the Judiciary, will receive careful consideration and that it may be enacted into law and may be found an adequate preventive and punishment for such conduct.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to ask the Senator from Montana a question. Was there any defect in the legal proceedings by which these trouble makers were sentenced and put in jail a few weeks ago?

Mr. MYERS. None that I know of. I am not in a position to pass upon that. I do not believe any was claimed. There is none of which I know.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Inasmuch as the law was sufficient to land them in jail and they only got out because the President wanted them out, I fail to see why additional legislation is necessary on the subject.

Mr. MYERS. There seems to be a doubt in the mind of some whether the present law is sufficient, and I think it ought to be put beyond doubt. I think at any rate the laws are not stringent or severe enough, and they ought to be plainer and more severe and comprehensive.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. They were stringent enough to land the malefactors in jail. The Senator had better propose an amendment to the Constitution preventing the President from pardoning out all malefactors after the law has once taken its course.

Mr. MYERS. No; I differ from the Senator on that. I say I think the President erred in that he was too good hearted and generous, but the fact that he may have erred does not prevent me from feeling that there should be a more comprehensive, adequate, and stringent law on the subject.

REGISTRY OF FOREIGN-BUILT VESSELS.

Mr. JONES of Washington submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2733) to authorize the President to permit, by proclamation, foreign-built vessels registered under the laws of the United States and vessels of foreign registry to engage in the coastwise trade of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

WAR REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray was expenses and for other purposes.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the pending bill. I desire to have it read and printed and then lie on the table.

While I am on my feet, although a discussion of the amendment is out of order at this time, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a brief statement which is the predicate on which the amendment is based, and among other things a brief opinion of Judge Rose in the case of the United States against Baker and others, in which the court instructed the jury to return a verdict of not guilty, the defendants having been indicted for circulating a petition or other literature requesting the repeal of the selective-draft law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. That until Congress otherwise provide, no part of the moneys raised or received under the authority of this act or otherwise shall be accepted, expended, or used, either directly or indirectly, to transport over the seas any citizen of the United States drafted into the military service thereof, unless such citizen shall also have volunteered for such service over the seas.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the matter sent to the desk by the Senator from Oklahoma will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

STATEMENT WITH REFERENCE TO THE AMENDMENT TO THE WAR REVENUE BILL.

A number of my constituents have requested me to submit a proposal of this character. My principal object, however, in offering the amendment is to stimulate both conservation and efficiency. To conserve, at least for the present, our own man power and to render more efficient the man power of the entente allies. The central allies have a total population of only 140,000,000. This means approximately 28,000,000 of men between the ages of 18 and 45 years. It means 14,000,000 men between the ages of 21 and 30, inclusive. On the other hand, the entente allies, together with the United States, have an aggregate population of 1,200,000,000. This means 240,000,000 men between the ages of 18 and 45. It means 120,000,000 men between the ages of 21 and 30. Excluding the United States there are 110,000,000 men between the latter ages in the entente allied countries. Including the United States there are almost as many men between these ages as there are people of all descriptions in Germany and her allied countries. China, which has just declared war, has 32,000,000 men between the ages of 21 and 30. There is no dearth of man power among the entente allies. What they need most is to make this enormous man power effective on the field of battle. What they need most is not men but munitions, arms, the weapons of war, and other necessary supplies. The United States can furnish these better than China or any other allied country. China, Russia, India, and other countries can spare men better than the United States. President Wilson said that the Nation had volunteered en masse, and each man must do the part for which he is best equipped. Each nation waging war against Germany and her allies should do the part for which it is best equipped. Japan, for some reason, is conserving her man power. She has been in the war three years. She has sent no army to the front. There are no better soldiers in the world than the Japanese. So far Japan has contributed practically nothing but munitions and equipment. Japan and Great Britain have an alliance both offensive and defensive. Japan has conserved both her man power and her "dignity." Is not her example worthy of our consideration, at least for the present, no matter how much the false pride of the jingo may declaim against it. Excluding equipment we could maintain a Chinese army of 5,000,000 men perhaps at less cost than it would require to maintain an American army of 2,000,000. We could send our Regular Army or Navy and the volunteer air fleet as large as the exigencies of war demand, and all the volunteers which Col. Roosevelt or anyone else could raise for foreign service. We could then devote this country, the greatest workshop in the world, more largely to the maintenance or assistance of the vast armies of the entente allies. This would be one of the best guaranties of a short and successful war; of an early, honorable, and lasting peace—that consummation so devoutly to be wished. The first Parliament of Edward III passed the following statute to prohibit compulsory service over the sea. This statute was in harmony with the sixteenth section of Magna Charta, "That no man from henceforth shall be charged to arm himself, otherwise than he was wont in the time of his progenitors, the Kings of England; and that no man be compelled to go out of his shire before real necessity requireth, and sudden coming of strange enemies into the realm; and then it shall be done as hath been used in times past for the defense of the realm." Hallam says that "This statute, by no means of inconsiderable importance, in our constitutional history, put a stop for some ages to these arbitrary conscriptions." "The successful resistance thus made by Parliament appears to have produced the discontinuance of compulsory levies for foreign warfare."—(Hallam's Constitutional History of England.)

Inscribed on Washington's sword at Mount Vernon, the most sacred memorial of American liberty and independence, is the following injunction to the legatees from the Father of his Country: "Not to unsheath them for the purpose of shedding blood except it be for self-defense, in defense of their country and its rights, and in the latter case to keep them unsheathed and prefer falling with them in their hands to the relinquishment thereof."

The following extract is taken from the President's Red Cross speech delivered in the city of Washington on May 12 last:

I say the heart of the country is in this war because it would not have gone into it if its heart had not been prepared for it. It would not have gone into it if it had not first believed that here was an opportunity to express the character of the United States.

The following extract is from the President's peace without victory address to the United States Senate January 22, 1917:

Fortunately we have received very explicit assurances on this point. The statesmen of both of the groups of nations now arrayed against one another have said, in terms that could not be misinterpreted, that it was no part of the purpose they had in mind to crush their antagonists. But the implications of these assurances may not be equally clear to all—may not be the same on both sides of the water. I think it will be serviceable if I attempt to set forth what we understand them to be.

They imply, first of all, that it must be a peace without victory. It is not pleasant to say this. I beg that I may be permitted to put my own interpretation upon it and that it may be understood that no other interpretation was in my thought. I am seeking only to face realities and to face them without soft concealments. Victory would mean peace forced upon the loser, a victor's terms imposed upon the vanquished. It would be accepted in humiliation, under duress, at an intolerable sacrifice, and would leave a sting, a resentment, a bitter memory upon which terms of peace would rest, not permanently, but only as upon quicksand. Only a peace between equals can last. Only a peace the very principle of which is equality and a common participation in a common benefit. The right state of mind, the right feeling between nations, is as necessary for a lasting peace as is the just settlement of vexed questions of territory or of racial and national allegiance.

The following is from President Wilson's book entitled "New Freedom":

I don't want a smug lot of experts to sit down behind closed doors in Washington and play Providence to me.

[In the United States District Court for the District of Maryland. July 11, 1917. Judge Rose, presiding. The United States of America v. Romanus E. Baker and Jacob M. Wilhide.]

REMARKS OF THE COURT IN RULING UPON ADMISSIBILITY OF TESTIMONY.

The COURT. I might as well make perfectly clear what I understand to be the issue in the case.

Every man has a perfect right to any opinion he may see fit to form about any proposed law or about any law that is on the statute books. Any man may do anything, in itself legal, to secure the repeal of any law in force. To that end he may make any argument that commends itself to his reason and judgment against the policy of any particular law, whether it be the law for a selective draft or any other, and he is not answerable for the wisdom of his arguments. He could not very well be put on trial even for the good faith of some of them. I am afraid if he could be, most of the political orators in every campaign would be liable for much they say about the other party. We all of us say more against our political opponents than we really believe. But there is one limit. As long as the law is the law it is the duty of every man to obey it, and he may not, under color or pretense of arguing against the wisdom of the law, or of advocating its repeal, do anything with intent to procure its violation. Now, I have not seen these circulars that were distributed by the defendants; they may be wise or unwise, temperate or intemperate. I do not know a thing about them. But the one thing that the jury is to inquire into is not as to the wisdom or the lack of wisdom of any statements in those circulars or their truthfulness or their fairness. That is not the question. The one sole question in the case is whether these men, in anything they did, intended to persuade men not to register under the draft, or, after they were registered, to persuade them not to obey the order to come to the colors. That is the one question. So the real inquiry here is, Can the Government show, always beyond a reasonable doubt, that these men were trying to persuade people to disobey the law? Whether they approached candidates for enlistment or persons within the age for enlistment and made any statements to such persons which might naturally make such persons reluctant to obey the law is one of the facts to be taken into consideration by the jury; but the jury can not convict unless they are satisfied, of course, beyond a reasonable doubt, that these men were then engaged in doing something which they purposed and intended should prevent men within the military age from obeying the law. If the jury is satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt, then the case is made out. If they have any doubt about the purpose of these men, they must acquit them, however mistaken the jury may happen to think they were about the policy of the law, or however unfair or extravagant the jury may think their arguments against it were.

(At the conclusion of the Government's case:)

The COURT. I do not think there is anything to go to the jury in this case.

You may have your own opinions about that circular; I have very strong individual opinions about it and as to the wisdom and fairness of what is said there, but, so far as I can see, it is principally a circular intended to induce people to subscribe to a Socialist newspaper and to get recruits for the Socialist Party. I do not think that we ought to attempt to prosecute people for that kind of thing. It may be very unwise in its effect and it may be unpatriotic at that particular time and place, but it would be going very far indeed—further, I think, than any law that I know of would justify—to hold that there has been made out any case here even tending to show that there was an attempt to persuade men not to obey the law.

There is a very lurid description of the horrors of war in that circular, some of it well written, some of it not so well written. But, after all, there is no difference of opinion that war is a terrible catastrophe and involves many terrible things. The circular develops some sort of a theory, not very clearly argued out, that if everybody had voted the Socialist ticket there would have been no war. The circular ends up with an appeal to subscribe to the Socialist paper for 50 cents a year or 25 cents for every six months.

Mr. LATANE. The side of it that appealed to the Government was this, your honor. Of course, we are perfectly satisfied with your honor's determination of the matter, but just in explanation it starts out with the words "Conscription is upon us and the draft law is a fact."

The COURT. That I understand to be a fair and reasonable deduction that from their point of view it all could be avoided if the people earlier had taken this Socialist paper and had voted the Socialist ticket.

Mr. LATANE. The point that occurred to the Government is this: These people are too clever to directly in print attack the draft law, so under guise of advocating the principles of the Socialist Party they give the whole draft proposition a very raw deal.

The COURT. That is possible; but you must prove the intent beyond the possibility of a reasonable doubt.

Mr. LATANE. All we want is to get some judicial determination of the matter.

The COURT. The judicial determination of the matter is that in whatever form they put what they say or do, whether that of advocating the principles of any political party—Republican, Democratic, Prohibitionist, Socialist—or under any other guise whatsoever, it is an offense to do anything with the intent of bringing about a violation of the law; but the commission of that offense must be proved, the intent must be established by evidence which will justify a jury in holding that it was made out beyond a reasonable doubt, and in this case there is no such evidence.

Gentlemen of the jury, you have the instructions of the court to return a verdict of not guilty.

Test:

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names.

Brandegee	Gronna	Martin	Simmons
Broussard	Hale	Myers	Smoot
Calder	Husting	New	Sterling
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Swanson
Culberson	Kellogg	Overman	Thompson
Curtis	Kenyon	Page	Trammell
Dillingham	Kirby	Pittman	Underwood
Frelinghuysen	Knox	Poindexter
Gerry	Lodge	Saulsbury
Gore	McNary	Sheppard

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish to announce the necessary absence on account of illness of my colleague [Mr. HUGHES].

Mr. MYERS. My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Thirty-seven Senators only have answered to their names. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. HARDWICK, Mr. JOHNSON of California, Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. SHIELDS, Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, and Mr. SUTHERLAND answered to their names when called.

Mr. KIRBY. I announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. ROBINSON]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. NELSON, Mr. RANSDELL, Mr. REED, Mr. HARDING, Mr. BRADY, Mr. ASHURST, Mr. POMERENE, Mr. MCCUMBER, and Mr. BANKHEAD entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. MARTIN. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] is detained from the Senate by illness.

Mr. GERRY. I wish to announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], and the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] are detained on official business.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. HARDWICK. I offer an amendment to the pending bill. I desire to have it pending and printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. THOMPSON. I propose an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I offer an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask may be read for the information of the Senate and printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 88, line 16, insert, after the word "repealed," the following proviso:

Provided, That the Governments of the allies of the United States in the war with the German Empire, or any of them, shall have the right under such rules, regulations, or bonds, as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time provide, to import into the United States, free of taxes, such raw sugar as the said Governments may own, to be refined and exported to the territory of such Governments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I offer the following amendment, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] yesterday offered an amendment to section 1105, page 98. The committee had made no amendment to it. The matter covered in the amendment of the Senator from Alabama appears to the committee as a highly necessary and proper thing, and I desire on behalf of the committee to accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama, and I now move——

Mr. HARDWICK. Let us see what it is before consent is given.

Mr. SIMMONS. I offer this amendment to section 1105, on page 98.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 98, strike out lines 9 to 21, inclusive, and insert:

SEC. 1105. That the salaries of all postmasters throughout the United States shall continue to be computed on the basis of existing law and calculated on the basis of postage rates existing on the 1st day of July, 1917, and shall not be increased by reason of additional receipts due to increased postage rates provided for in this act.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield for a question?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Has the Senator heard from the department in respect to this matter?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I have not.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator defer action for just a moment until I can get some recommendations which the department sent here with respect to this section?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator from North Carolina will yield to me for a moment, I should like to make an explanation. I do not think there can be any possible complication in reference to this situation. As the House bill stood, it fixed the status of the postmaster's pay as it stands to-day.

We all know that the pay of the postmaster is dependent on the receipts of the office. If the bill went through as it stood, every office would be graded according to its present receipts. If the receipts fell off, and the office ought to be reduced from a second to a fourth class post office, the law as proposed in the House bill would prevent any change. On the other hand, if there were large increases of receipts. due to many causes, for instance, a cantonment being established at a small town, as I have one in mind, probably bringing 40,000 troops to a small town, it will be necessary to have an increase of postal facilities. Under the existing law the amount of clerical help and the clerical pay, which are to a large extent dependent on the postmaster's salary, going up and down according to the postmaster's salary; but the House bill would block that proposition and hold all postmasters chained to the present salary and the present clerical force.

The amendment which I propose simply provides that there shall be no change in existing law; that the salary of postmasters shall be computed on the basis of the postal receipts as of July 1, 1917, and that no increase shall be allowed because of increased postage receipts due to increasing the rates of postage under this act, or, in other words, if we increase the rate of postage to 3 cents, when it comes to calculating the postage receipts for the purpose of fixing salaries and allowances, the receipts from first-class postage stamps. will be computed on a basis of two-thirds of the total amount, or 2 cents a letter, which is the basis to-day. The amendment which I propose, if adopted, merely leaves the question of fixing postmasters' salaries and the necessary clerical forces that follow postmasters' salaries on the exact basis that it is to-day, without change.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator whether that will interfere with the increase of the clerical force?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all.

Mr. OVERMAN. Where cantonments have been established postmasters will require additional clerical force.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly; but the House bill would block that absolutely. If my amendment, however, is adopted, there will be no change whatever; the matter will go along under existing law as it is to-day, except if a postmaster's receipts from 3-cent postage stamps amount to $300, two-thirds of that will be taken as a basis, and the receipts will be put at $200, as they would have been if there had been no change in the postal rates.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator from Alabama will yield to me. I think we can get at this matter. The Post Office Department believes that what ought to be done is that the date July 1, 1917, as provided by the House bill ought to be retained. The Senate committee proposes to strike out July; but the department also believes that all after the words "unless compensation," in line 15, ought to be stricken out, and that the section ought to be passed in that form. Is that the effect of the Senator's amendment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is the effect of my amendment, except that my proposition is the simpler proposition. My amendment is simply a proposition that the existing law shall continue; that the basis of pay shall remain on the basis of receipts, as the law is fixed to-day; and that the new tax on postal matter shall not be included in estimating the postmaster's salary. That is all there is to it.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is exactly what the department wants. There is no trouble, then. It is merely stating their proposition in different terms, and there is no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment which has just been offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, on page 71, line 10, in reference to parcel-post packages, I move to strike out the words "weighing more than 4 ounces."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina to the amendment reported by the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the committee amendment on page 71, line 10, it is proposed to strike out the words "weighing more than 4 ounces."

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I am very much in favor of the amendment to the amendment, but even if it be adopted I think the section ought to be stricken out.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator from Georgia will pardon me, I am going to follow that amendment with another amendment to insert after the word "post," in line 11, the words "on which the postage amounts to 25 cents or more."

Mr. HARDWICK. That is right.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, we are unable to hear on this side of the Chamber just what amendment has been proposed. We are unable to learn, from the little talk the Senator from North Carolina is having with some of his colleagues on the other side of the Chamber, what the proposed amendment is.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will state to the Senator from North Dakota that I have proposed two amendments to that section. One of them is on page 71, line 10, to strike out the words "weighing more than 4 ounces."

Mr. McCUMBER. What is the next amendment?

Mr. SIMMONS. The next amendment is to insert after the word "post," in line 11, the words "on which the postage amounts to 25 cents or more," the effect being that there will be no tax imposed on a parcel-post package upon which the postage amounts to less than 25 cents.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I am heartily in favor of both of those amendments, although after the section is perfected I shall move to strike it out.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understood the Senator from Georgia intended to make that motion, and I was simply perfecting the committee amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 71, the first amendment is, in line 10, to strike out the words "weighing more than 4 ounces"; and in line 11, after the words "parcel post," to insert the words "on which the postage amounts to 25 cents or more."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment, which has been offered by the Senator from North Carolina.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I move to strike out the section as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the committee has not yet been agreed to.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am moving to disagree to it. I am opposing the adoption of the amendment proposed by the committee; in other words, I want to disagree to the committee amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I think that motion would not properly come until after the committee amendments are disposed of, because the amendment now is——

Mr. HARDWICK. But I am opposed to agreeing to the committee amendment. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee and to that proposition I am opposed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the committee amendment was passed over. The amendments just adopted were to the committee amendment. The question now comes on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee as amended.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish first to perfect the amendment. Did I understand the Chair to announce that the amendments had been agreed to?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments to the amendment have been adopted. The question now is on the adoption of the amendment as amended.

Mr. SIMMONS. I assume the motion of the Senator from Georgia is now in order.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am not making any motion, because the question comes automatically before the Senate on the adoption of the committee amendment.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. Pardon me just a moment, in order that I may first state the proposal. To that proposition I am opposed, and I am asking now to be heard in opposition to the adoption of the committee amendment as amended. I now yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BRADY. My understanding is that the Senator is simply opposed to the adoption of——

Mr. HARDWICK. I am opposed to the adoption of the parcel-post amendment as an entirety.

Mr. BRADY. To the adoption of the amendment of the committee?

Mr. HARDWICK. I am opposed to the proposition to tax the parcel post of this country.

Mr. BRADY. And on that question the Senator expects to address the Senate at this time?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes, sir. That is the idea.

Mr. President, I congratulate the Senator from North Carolina and the committee on the amendments they have offered, because if this proposition is to go through, it certainly ought to go through in the form in which it now stands and not as originally suggested by the committee. I presume the committee had no intention to tax small parcel-post packages of the country weighing a little over 4 ounces, on which the charge amounts to 5, 6, or 7 cents, or something like that, and on which this tax as originally suggested would have been as high as 22 per cent in some instances, according to the estimates of the department.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will state to the Senator that we did in our amendment exempt packages weighing less than 4 ounces, but it turns out that about 610,000,000 parcel packages weigh 5 ounces or more.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is exactly what I told the Senator when he first brought this proposal in here. Of course, the amendment he has now submitted is in accordance with the suggestion I then made, although, as I then said to the Senator, as he will remember, I did not think that this action ought to be taken. I did not think we ought to put a stamp tax on one of the functions of this Government. I do not think that we ought to increase the parcel-post rates to the people of this country in any such indirect way. If we think, and are prepared to stand on the proposal, that the rates are too low on parcel-post matter, then we ought to raise them directly; but such a proposition, I submit, ought to come from the committee having jurisdiction of postal matters, which has or can acquire full information with respect to these questions. The danger of this sort of proposition coming from other committees is immediately illustrated in this particular matter. The Senate Committee on Finance, which of course does not deal with these postal matters, presented a proposition which not one of them could have supported when they understood it and when it was explained to them; and I think that is a very good reason why proposals to increase parcel-post rates ought not to come from the Finance Committee of the Senate, even on a bill of this character.

The department believes, and I think believes correctly, that that is not the way to increase parcel-post rates, if Congress wants to increase them. The department believes, and I think believes correctly, that if we want to increase the parcel-post rates in this country the question ought to go before the committees having jurisdiction of the subject matter, where hearings may be held and all parties in interest, including the department, be heard on the merits of the proposition, and then increase the rates or decrease them, or do whatever else Congress pleases, after action by the appropriate committees with respect to the matter can be had.

Now, the department submits to me this memorandum——

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Then, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator, of course.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have just read this provision over and do not know exactly how it reads as now amended; but, as I understand, it puts a tax upon packages where the postage is 25 cents or over.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes, sir; it is a stamp tax paid by the man who sends the package, by the consignor; but, of course, in order to avail himself of the governmental function at the rate fixed by law he must pay 1 cent more in the shape of a stamp tax to the Government for the service the Government renders him.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The thought I had in mind was that a person in a certain zone would pay the tax, while a person living in another zone would not; but, if it is paid by the sender, of course he pays the tax when the parcel goes into certain zones, and does not pay the tax if it goes into other zones.

Mr. HARDWICK. The amendment of the Senator from North Carolina to some extent obviates that, because in all cases, no matter how far the package goes, where the parcel-post charge is as much as 25 cents, then the tax of 1 cent is exacted.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understand that; but is not the parcel-post charge, however, largely determined by the distance?

Mr. HARDWICK. No matter how it is determined, whether by distance or weight—and both determine it—when the charge reaches 25 cents the stamp tax is imposed, and not until then. So that in one case the charge might be run up as high as 25 cents by distance and in another case it might be run up as high as 25 cents by weight; but, no matter in which way it is run up to 25 cents, whenever it gets there, then this stamp tax of 1 cent would be imposed. Have I made it plain to the Senator? That is as I understand it.

Now, the department submits this memorandum:

At the present time there are approximately 1,025,000,000 parcels handled each year on which the postage is approximately $72,000,000. Approximately 610,000,000 of these parcels weigh 5 ounces or more, and would be taxed 1 cent under the proposed revenue measure—

Of course, that part of it has been remedied by the amendment which the Senator from North Carolina has proposed and to which the Senate has agreed; but this part of it is not changed—and at least 45,000,000 parcels would be taxed more than 1 cent, as the postage would be in excess of 25 cents.

The parcel post is on a different basis from that of the express companies because the entire profits arising from the Parcel Post Service, estimated to be $10,000,000 or more annually, are turned over to the Government. The Government, therefore, receives the entire profits from this service whereas it receives none from the express companies. The minimum charge for an express parcel is understood to be 25 cents, whereas under the proposed bill on a parcel sent by parcel post weighing 5 ounces but less than 1 pound the postage may vary from 5 to 12 cents, according to the zone to which shipped, and the burden would be the same as on a parcel sent by express where the charge is 25 cents.

Of course, that has been met now by the amendment.

In other words, it would be an increase of from 8 per cent to 20 per cent in the cost of the transportation of these smaller parcel-post packages, whereas it would be only 4 per cent on the minimum express charge.

A tax on parcel post simply adds an additional burden on the large number of persons who reside on the rural and star routes—

Those living in the rural sections of the country—who have no other transportation facilities than the parcel post. To add an additional tax on these parcels on a service which is already netting the Government a handsome profit simply increases the burden on the farmer and residents of the rural communities and hinders to that extent the transportation of commodities between the producer and consumer, which every effort is being exerted at this time to increase.

Mr. President, in addition to that, the Post Office Department has sent me a number of figures showing the details with respect to the parcel-post business, which I am going to ask permission to have printed in the RECORD, without reading, as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. CURTIS. Does the department estimate the amount of tax that will be collected on packages the charge for the carrying of which is 25 cents or more?

Mr. HARDWICK. No; they do not.

Mr. CURTIS. As I understand, the Senator desires to disagree to the amendment reported by the committee?

Mr. HARDWICK. I desire to disagree to that amendment. I do not want to agree to the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Kansas that about 46,000,000 packages——

Mr. HARDWICK. Forty-five million packages?

Mr. SMOOT. Nearly 46,000,000 packages will have to pay the tax.

Mr. CURTIS. A tax of 2 cents?

Mr. SMOOT. The tax is 1 cent where the charge is 25 cents for the service and 1 cent additional for each 25 cents or fractional part thereof over that charge. So on 45,000,000 packages the 1 cent would amount to $450,000.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator must remember the tax is not in all cases 1 cent.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to say that in many instances the tax will be a good deal more than that.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think a safe estimate—just guessing now; this is merely my opinion; the department has not estimated that for me—would be about three-quarters of a million dollars.

Mr. SMOOT. It would be more than that.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is my guess.

Mr. SMOOT. I should think it would be all of that and perhaps a little more.

Mr. HARDWICK. It would be at least that. If it were only 1 cent on each one of these 45,000,000 packages, it would be $450,000, and 1 cent more for each additional 25 cents paid in postal charges; so that I think it would be three-fourths of a million dollars or possibly a million dollars. I think that is not an excessive estimate of the amount that will be raised by this tax, which will be taken along the rural and star routes from the pockets of the people in those communities, if this amendment prevails.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do.

Mr. BRADY. I may say that I am in sympathy and in accord with the Senator's views on this matter. I have been wondering, however, whether the figures that he is asking to have printed in the RECORD would give the information that we want to have given at this time, in view of the two amendments that have been adopted?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not think so, because they were principally gotten up to show how onerous this tax would be on these smaller parcel-post packages; but they will be very interesting to the Senate, and I think to the country, as showing the details of this business and the amount and kind of packages we are carrying; and since they had already been prepared at considerable trouble and some expense, I thought it was best to give the public the benefit of them.

Mr. BRADY. My only thought was that after the discussion we have had on the amendments, and the position that the Senator and I as well expect to take when we come to a vote, they might mislead the very people who ought to have correct information on the subject.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; the figures show for themselves the basis upon which they are made up. If anybody should guess what is in them, he might be somewhat misled; but if you read them you are bound to understand them, and so is anybody else who reads them.

Mr. BRADY. It is entirely satisfactory to me if it is to the Senator.

Mr. HARDWICK. Now, Senators, that is the view of the department. I have read it to you in their own language. I want to indorse it heartily, and I want to ask the Senate to stand by it. I have always been opposed as a matter of principle, as the Senate knows, to too many governmental activities along business lines. The one exception that I have thought could be safely made and ought to be safely made to the proposition that the sole business of the Government was the governing business was the establishment and maintenance of a parcel post in connection with the rural routes of this country and in order to serve the people who reside in the rural sections of this country. The reason is obvious. There is no reason growing out of necessity why we should have established a general parcel post at all for this country generally, because the great express companies serving the cities and towns of this country could have rendered and were rendering that service.

If the objection was urged, as it was urged in this body and in the other House of Congress, that their rates were excessive or their practices were burdensome and oppressive, the answer was that we had exactly the same power to regulate their rates and to control their practices that we had with respect to the railroad companies, and that on the same principle that we control railroad rates and regulate railroad practices we had an equal right to control and regulate express rates and express practices. So that I could see very little reason, when all this agitation was before the country, for the Government embarkation on a general parcel-post project; but I do think, and I have always thought, that the fact was entirely different when it came to the rural sections of this country. There it is impossible for private business to discharge this function. There no adequate arrangement can be made by private business to furnish this service. Not only that, but everywhere throughout the rural sections of the country the Government already had mail routes that were being operated day after day among these people and carrying the mail to them. How easy, how practicable, and how sensible, therefore, it was to provide that these same facilities that the Government already had should be used to give to these people who resided in the rural sections of our Republic this necessary and proper service.

The Congress did it, but the result has been, from a practical standpoint, at least, disappointing up to date. Taking the rural routes of the United States as a whole, Mr. President, the figures show that the people from the country have sent on an average one parcel per day on each route in the United States, and no more, and that the people from the towns and cities where these routes originate have only sent an average of eight parcels per day out to the country from these cities and towns. In other words, the rural parcel post has not been utilized to the extent that it ought to be, nor to the extent that it is destined to be in the development of this great service.

I do not see the reason, the desirability, or the justice of burdening this service—because, just as the department says, that is where this service goes, to the rural communities, along the star routes and rural routes, in the main—with a stamp tax because the express companies may have to pay some sort of a tax under this bill. You can handle that in a perfectly easy way. If your anxiety is to take care of the express companies, the Interstate Commerce Commission can reduce their rates. If their rates are too high when this stamp tax is added to them, they can be lowered; but in my opinion, Mr. President, there is no reason why you should tax a Government service, or tax people before they are allowed to use a great public service that the Government affords them.

I think the department is right. I believe we would make a great mistake to do this at all; and, although in the form that it is now proposed it would be vastly less injurious than it would have been as originally suggested, yet in my judgment it ought not to be done at all. I sympathize with the views of the department and hope the Senate will not agree to the proposal at all.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I heartily approve of the amendments that have been adopted to the committee amendment. I want to say to the Senators that this amendment was discussed in the Finance Committee for two or three days before it was adopted. The fact was brought to the attention of the committee that by the imposition of a tax upon all express packages, that are carried in direct competition with the Parcel Post System, if there were not a tax imposed upon the parcel-post packages there would be a discrimination against the express companies of this country.

I take it for granted that every Senator knows the financial condition of the express companies of the United States to-day. Some are struggling for existence since the establishment of the parcel post, and if we now discriminate against the express companies by imposing upon them a tax, or imposing upon the individual that uses the express company for transportation a tax as provided in this bill, and do not impose a similar tax upon the parcel post, the discrimination between the two transportation agencies will be even greater than it is to-day.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. Why could not that situation be met by lowering the express rates?

Mr. SMOOT. I will answer the Senator now. I was going to come to that later, but I might as well do it now.

The committee looked at it in this way, Mr. President: This bill is a temporary measure. If the war ceases within a year, this bill will cease to be in effect shortly after that period, and the tax that will be imposed upon the express companies, and also the tax that will be imposed upon the parcel-post packages as provided in the bill, will cease. That being the case, the committee thought that it was unfair in this revenue bill to undertake to increase the parcel-post rates. In fact, I want to say that, as far as I am personally concerned, I am not in favor of increasing the rates of the parcel-post; but I do believe, in justice to the express companies, that there ought to be an equalization between the two. The committee took that position, and I believe that they are right.

The department, in its statement to the committee, does not distinguish between a postal rate and a tax on the transportation of goods, just the same as the Senator from Idaho yesterday did not distinguish between an excise tax upon a $500 automobile and the imposition of a regular tax upon property.

I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the increase in burden, spoken of by the Senator from Georgia, to the shippers along the rural routes of the country is very small indeed. In the statement by the department showing by each unit of weight the estimated number of parcels mailed at all post offices, the postage collected, and the weight in pounds for the fiscal year 1917, it is shown that under this provision as amended there will be collected about $2,000,000. The total number of packages was 1,024,362,744, and the postage upon those parcels amounted to $71,908,380. One cent upon a package of 25 cents, as imposed in this bill, would be a rate of 4 per cent; and to take off the packages down to 10 ounces, as is shown here by the statement, would leave a postal revenue under the Parcel Post System of about $50,000,000; and 4 per cent on the $50,000,000 would, of course, be $2,000,000, which I estimate will be received under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. President, the number of packages on which more than 25 cents is charged are mostly shipped between cities, and not from rural routes or country districts. If this tax of 1 cent is imposed, which will equalize the burden between the express companies and the parcels post, and which is only temporary, it is to be paid mostly by the shippers from city to city. In fact, the great bulk of it will come from that source; and it does seem to me that no one ought to complain during these war times, when we have to raise so much money, of placing a 1-cent stamp upon a package upon which the charges will amount to not less than 25 cents.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator just made the statement that these packages which pay more than 25 cents are for the most part packages shipped from the cities. Is it generally understood that the larger shipments by parcels post are made in the same way?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; all over the United States.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, let me interrupt the Senator. I do not think that is a fact. The Senator wants to be accurate, I know.

Mr. SMOOT. I do want to be accurate; and I will say this, Mr. President, that all of the testimony presented to the committee upon that very question showed that the greater number of packages originated in the cities and went from city to city.

Mr. HARDWICK. The trouble is, if the Senator will yield again right there, that the Senator did not even hear the Post Office Department people about this thing. I do not know whom he heard except the express company people.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it is unfair for the Senator to say that.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, all right. Maybe you did not hear them. I do not know whether you did or not. I thought you did, because they came to see me and I sent them to the Finance Committee and told them that they would have to come to see you, so I suppose they saw the Finance Committee, did they not?

Mr. SMOOT. A number of them called at my office.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, I say they came before the committee, did they not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair suggests that orderly procedure would require Senators to address the Chair.

Mr. HARDWICK. Each time I ask a question, Mr. President? The Senator yielded, I thought, and I thought I addressed the Chair the first time.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yielded to the Senator.

Mr. HARDWICK. And I am pursuing a colloquy now. If the Senator will yield just a little further, the Post Office Department says, and says it in this statement that I have read, that the burden of this tax will fall on the country people.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the statement the Senator read was based upon the amendment as it was reported to the Senate. I have a copy of the statement that the Senator has read from the Post Office Department. This statement was sent to the committee; and I also have the figures, I suppose, that the Senator himself presented, because these are the official figures from the Post Office Department, and it was from that source that I received my information.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield again——

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Not only that, since we have said so much about what the Post Office Department has said, but the fact is that even in sending those figures to the Finance Committee, as they sent them to me, the Post Office Department followed them with a letter addressed to your chairman, in which they stand by the statement made in this report and say this section ought not to be adopted at all, in their judgment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have not made any statement that the Post Office Department claimed that the amendment should be adopted. Of course, the Post Office Department will be opposed to the imposition of any kind of a tax upon the parcel post. It has no special interest in what may happen to its competitors. All it is looking out for is simply the business in which it is interested. I think it is a very small thing for the Post Office Department to object to the imposition of a 1-cent stamp tax upon the transportation of a package, the charge for carrying which is 25 cents.

Mr HARDWICK. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator, if he will yield to me just a moment, as long as he has criticized the department just a little—and I do not object to that; it is the right of any Senator to do it—that the Post Office Department has no interest in this matter except the interest of millions of people of the United States, the public interest.

Mr. SMOOT. Nor has the Finance Committee any other interest.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; but the express companies have a different interest.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, we are not considering the interest of the express companies alone.

Mr. HARDWICK. I thought you were.

Mr. SMOOT. We considered the business interests of the country in general and the people in particular. The committee took into consideration all of the circumstances surrounding the case, and so it has in the case of all of the taxes imposed in this bill, and so it will have to do in the case of all of the taxes that may be imposed upon the people of the United States hereafter; and I want to say to the Senator that there will be a great many of them.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator's statement that the larger packages were shipped between cities rather startled me. I have been in Congress for some years, and the demand for an increased weight to be sent by parcel post has always come from the country, from the rural districts. Now, I do not know but that the Senator has given it more thought than I have. I know that he is generally accurate in his statements.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator to remember that I stated that the greater number of packages were sent in that way. There is no question but that the rural districts send large-size packages and would perhaps send greater weights if the law would permit them to do so, but I am speaking now of the number of such packages that are shipped.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. Did the committee take into consideration the fact that the only means of transportation the rural districts have is the parcel post?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. If a stamp tax is imposed, of course the sender has to pay that tax. The same is true if it is sent by express. In either case the sender pays the tax. But may it not have this effect: If we impose a tax which I believe is onerous in this case, and compel the people out in the country to have these stamps and put them on the packages before they can be sent, does not the Senator think it may lead to disturbance of business, so that there will be less business transacted, and instead of the Government making $10,000,000 profit, as said by the Senator from Georgia, there may be a great deal less business, and instead of getting revenue from the transportation through parcel post we may sustain a loss? I think that ought to be taken into consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, under the bill there is imposed a 1-cent tax upon packages of express companies. Now, we propose to treat the parcel-post packages just the same as we do with the express packages. A tax of 1 cent upon 25 cents is never going to reduce the number of shipments.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. GRONNA. There will be trouble in getting stamps.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from North Dakota suggests that there will be trouble in getting stamps. No; as the stamps will be for sale at every post office in the United States, there will be no trouble whatever in getting stamps any more than there would be trouble in getting a stamp to send a letter. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. I wish to suggest to the senator that a stamp tax is always troublesome and always has a tendency to reduce the volume of business, because the people do not like to fool with it. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] made a very sensible suggestion. He said "You may hurt the revenue from this tax more than you will get from this vexatious annoying stamp tax." Besides that, while it is true there is a competitive condition between the express companies and the parcel post on business between the cities and towns of the country, and I can see how the Senator's argument to some extent rests on that basis, yet in your effort to handle that situation you put the same burden on the country people residing along the rural routes and the star routes, where there is no competition and where they must use the Government service; where there is no express company to do business with.

Mr. SMOOT. If the tax is a fair one let it fall where it will. I can not see but what it is a fair tax. If we imposed a tax upon one transportation agency and did not upon the other, then, the very suggestion the Senator made would be to drive the business from the concerns upon which we imposed a tax to one that there is no tax imposed upon, and that I think is unfair. The committe had that in mind.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to ask the Senator from Utah one or two questions. The first one is whether it is not absolutely fair to say that this is a tax on transportation?

Mr. SMOOT. It is.

Mr. NORRIS. Does it not follow always that the transportation in the end is paid by the consumer?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no doubt of it; and in this amendment I will say to the Senator we provide that this tax shall be paid by the consignor.

Mr. NORRIS. But in the end the consumer pays it. That is true of all transportation, is it not?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no doubt of it. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that we impose a tax upon transportation over every railroad by a tax on every pound of freight shipped and ticket sold by a railroad in the country.

Mr. NORRIS. There is more than one difference between the express companies and the Government. In the first place, the Government through its parcel post does business and is ready to do business between the country and cities and between different cities, while the express companies are not equipped and do not pretend to cover the same ground the parcel post does. Even if the Senator's arguments were good, it only applies in part to the parcel post. Is not that true?

Mr. SMOOT. There are places in the United States——

Mr. NORRIS. Are there not thousands of them——

Mr. SMOOT. There are places in the United States where the parcel post is taken advantage of that the express companies do not reach. No one questions that.

Mr. NORRIS. If the express companies did cover the whole ground then, I can not see why that argument would not be sound, and why, if they were doing the right kind of business, it would not be necessary to have a parcel post, but we ought not to injure the parcel post.

Mr. SMOOT. We are not going to injure the business of the parcel post by this 1-cent tax.

Mr. NORRIS. Does not the Senator think that the inconvenience as well as the cost will reduce business?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I do not. I will say to the Senator, it is so small that I do not believe that it will ever interfere with the parcel post, and certainly not amount to anything in the loss of revenue. The charges in the parcel post are so low now that people are taking advantage of it, as they ought to do, and the mere imposition of 4 per cent increase on the charges is never going to interfere with the amount of business by the parcel post, in my opinion.

Mr. President, there is just one other suggestion that I want to submit and then I will close. The Government of the United States gets every cent of the money that is paid for the tax upon parcel post. It goes into the Treasury of the United States. Therefore it seems to me that it would have been unwise for the committee to undertake at this time in this temporary revenue measure to impose higher rates on parcel-post packages. Again, the increase is so small by the imposition of the 1-cent tax that it would have been almost impossible to impose an equivalent increase on each zone rate so that it could have been collected. In some cases it would have amounted to only about one twenty-fifth of 1 cent and that is a pretty small amount to collect on small charges.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. I dislike to disturb the Senator again——

Mr. SMOOT. It is no disturbance.

Mr. GRONNA. But I think I should call the attention of the Senator to this instance: When we placed a stamp tax on checks, for instance, it seriously affected the banking business. Deposits were withdrawn to such an extent that the bankers became alarmed, and they had to borrow very largely. It was not because the stamp tax was excessive at all; it was the trouble and annoyance to which the people were put. The Senator knows that that will be true of the parcel post which was true of the stamp on bank checks.

Mr. SMOOT. I know at the time the tax was imposed upon bank checks it did have a bad effect upon country banks, but it seems to me that is an entirely different proposition. The people who deposited their money in a bank were entitled to every cent of the money so deposited, and the small depositor objected to the tax, and in many cases withdrew his money rather than pay it. There is a provision in this bill imposing a tax of 1 cent upon every check issued, no matter what the value of it may be, which I shall oppose.

So, Mr. President, it did seem to the committee that the amendment as amended, equalizing the charge between the express companies and the parcel post, and imposing no tax whatever on parcel-post packages the charge on which is less than 25 cents, is a fair and just imposition of a tax, and I sincerely hope the committee amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, to me this tax, although small, is unjustifiable and can not be justified on any ground that in my judgment is reasonable, or at least none that I have so far heard. Briefly stated, it is a tax on transportation. Every man, woman, and child is interested in the cost of transportation. It goes into everything that we eat and drink and wear and use. Although the tax in the first place is paid by the shipper, it is included in the charge that the consumer has to pay when he gets the goods. It is a consumers' tax. I concede that there may come a time, even in this war, when it will be necessary to increase the tax on consumption. I do not believe it has come yet. It never ought to come when an increase should be put upon consumption of the necessaries of life until every income and every profit above a fair living has been taxed and taken by the Government. We have almost reached the limit in the high cost of living. We have absolutely done so as to some classes of people, and now we propose indirectly—it is hardly indirectly—to increase the tax. It is in effect a direct increase of the cost of transportation through the medium of the parcel post.

Yesterday we had before the Senate a provision that would have raised, the committee said, $6,000,000 by a tax on inheritances, mostly raised on large inheritances running into the millions, where those who received them had made no effort to get them, where the men who had accumulated them and were entitled to them had passed away. So that would have been collected without any hardship on anybody. One of the reasons given yesterday for striking that out of the bill by the committee was that it was insignificant and small and would only raise $6,000,000. Here we have a provision to-day that the committee says will raise $2,000,000, although I doubt that very much.

Mr. HARDWICK. One million dollars, I think.

Mr. NORRIS. I understood the Senator from Utah, representing the committee, to say that it would raise $2,000,000. I do not think it would, but I am taking his argument for it—I think he is mistaken about it—that because it is only small and will only be a little bit we had better tack it on. It is to be paid in pennies by the consumers of the country. When the amount is going to be $6,000,000 and be paid by the wealth of the country you want to strike it out because it will not raise much revenue. If it raises $2,000,000 and is going to be paid in pennies by the poor, put it in because the burden is light and they will not notice it.

Mr. President, the report of the Post Office Department given here to-day in this debate shows that a profit has resulted to the department in the parcel-post business of $10,000,000, I believe. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia whether that is right? Will the Senator from Georgia give me his attention?

Mr. HARDWICK. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. NORRIS. Was it $10,000,000 the Post Office Department said was the profit from the parcel post?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes, sir; $10,000,000, in round numbers.

Mr. NORRIS. It is true that this money goes to the Government. Any tax less the expense would go to the Government. But if the parcel post is making a profit of $10,000,000, instead of increasing the rates, if we do anything with them, we ought to reduce them. It was never the intention for the Government to make a profit out of its business, although I always contended that we ought to charge enough so that there would be no deficit. However, if there is to be a change, if we are making a profit now of $10,000,000, this proposition, if the Senator from Utah is right, will mean that we will make a profit after it is agreed to of $12,000,000. That is going in the wrong direction. If we want to satisfy the millions of our citizens who wish to get an opportunity to reduce the cost of living, we ought to reduce the profit instead of increasing it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I fully agree with the Senator that it would be going in the wrong direction if it were not for war conditions and if we did not have to raise billions of dollars for the purpose of paying the expenses of the war.

Mr. NORRIS. As I said a few moments ago, there might come a time when I would favor even this kind of a proposition. I am in favor of carrying on the war to the utmost of our ability and to take the last dollar if necessary, but before I would increase the cost of living, already mounted sky-high, already so high that men and women and children are suffering on account of it—before I would raise it any higher I would want to tax every dollar of profit that there is in incomes or profits. Until we do that, in my judgment, we are not called upon to levy taxes upon consumption.

This is only one item in the bill that, it seems to me, is objectionable on that ground, and while the item itself is small there are dozens of others likewise small that in the aggregate amount to a good deal.

The Senator from Utah defends it on the ground that we ought to levy this tax in order to be fair to the express companies. If the Government was going into the express business like a business man for profit, I would give a good deal of consideration to that argument, but why did the Government go into the parcel-post business? Mainly because of the cry that came up from nearly all the people against the exorbitant charges and regulations of express companies. The Government went into the parcel-post business, and one of the objects was to regulate the express business. Of course the parcel-post business is an express business. But another reason why the Government went into it was because the express companies were covering the country wherever there was a profit. I say this without any faultfinding with the express companies. It was a business proposition with them. They covered the country wherever it was profitable and wherever it was not profitable, through the rural districts, and they could not make money out of it, they stayed out of the business. The Government going into it had to treat all its people alike and make the rate the same for all. It covers the entire country, both the profitable part and the unprofitable part. So the Government is doing a work that the express companies had never done and never attempted to do, and I presume never would do.

It seems to me that that is something we ought to take into consideration before we undertake to tax the consumers of the country in order to keep the express companies in business. If the express companies had done the work that the parcel post is doing and is destined to do, I presume we never would have had any agitation for a parcel post, and now since the Government has gone into it and has, as I understand the report from the Post Office Department, made a success of it, it is proposed here to tax it, because if we do not tax it its competition will be ruinous to the express companies.

Mr. President, personally I never saw any use in our transportation system by express companies, unless they had gone out farther into the field than they did go. Confining themselves as they did and as they do mainly and principally to operation along railroad lines, it has always seemed to me as though there was no excuse for their existence. The express company is simply an organization within another organization, increasing overhead expenses and doing what the organization of the railroad company ought to do without the interposition of another inside corporation such as the express companies.

So while I have no doubt that any of the express companies, even if they went out of business, would suffer, for they made ample money at least up to the time the Government went into the business, if the Government can do the business even at a profit to the Government, and we must increase that profit to the Government and likewise the burden on the people who utilize the parcel post in order to keep the express companies profitable and alive, it seems to me it would be better and would not be more than fair that the express companies should go out of business and let the Government handle it all through the means of the parcel post.

The Senator from Utah says—and I think it is true, and I have no particular interest in the controversy as to where the bulk of this business is done—that a great deal of the parcel-post business is done between the different cities of the country. I have been interested in the figures given by the Senator from Georgia showing the comparatively small amount—I think the rather disappointing amount—of that business which has been done in the rural districts. To my mind it is immaterial whether this business is done in the rural districts or between citizens of the cities; it is entitled to the same consideration at the hands of Congress. The justice of the proposition, it seems to me, is not decided by whether the business is done in the country or between the inhabitants of different cities.

It is conceded that the present rates are profitable to the Government, or at least I have not heard that statement disputed. I have no personal knowledge as to the matter; I am taking the figures of the department, which I think ought to know, and probably do know. It is profitable now; but every cent of it is paid by the consumers of the country; and whenever you tax that business you increase the burden of the consumer, and you increase to that extent the present high cost of living. If this tax will produce a revenue of $2,000,000 to the Treasury of the United States, it simply means that the already overburdened common people of the country are going to pay $2,000,000 more to live. I can not make anything else out of it. It seems to me, Mr. President, that the amendment ought to be defeated.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska is opposed to this amendment because it is a tax upon consumers. I should like to have the Senator from Nebraska or any other Senator or any other man upon the face of the earth give me a single instance in which a tax can be levied that will not ultimately be a tax upon the consumer. If this awful tax, this exorbitant tax of one penny, ought not to be put upon the shoulders of the consumer, then I should like to ask what tax can be levied which would not be in the end at least as exorbitant upon the consumer?

The Senator from Nebraska says that this 1 cent will be charged by the business men to the person who receives the package. That is absolutely true. If 26 cents is charged where now only 25 cents is charged, the consumer will pay that extra penny; that is true; no man can deny it; but has it occurred to the Senator, Mr. President, that when Sears, Roebuck & Co. put a 2-cent stamp on a letter acknowledging the receipt of payment or answering the question of a customer that 2 cents is charged to its customers in general? If Sears, Roebuck & Co. pay to the Government of the United States $200,000 in postage stamps every year, does anyone contend that that $200,000 is not charged to the consumers of the products that are sent by Sears, Roebuck & Co. to those consumers? Would the Senator from Nebraska, Mr. President, then ask that we should not require the payment of 2 cents' postage upon such letters forwarding receipts and conveying information to the customer because it is a tax upon the customer, and, therefore, the Government ought to carry such postal matter free and not charge it to the customer; that it ought never to impose a tax on any parcel-post packages above what the service absolutely costs the Government, because whatever these big concerns pay they charge back directly or indirectly to the consumer?

If we are to attempt to levy a tax for war purposes, every penny of which will not come back upon the consumer—if we are to avoid that dire result—then, Mr. President, we had better give up the attempt to raise any money whatever from taxation. We tax whisky and beer and liquors of all kinds—we levy heavy taxes on them—but does anyone believe that the tax is paid by the brewer or the distiller and is not charged back to the consumer? Can you imagine any tax upon any character of business that will not ultimately reach the consumer? I call attention to this fact, Mr. President, because there has been so much said in regard to taxes that will fall upon the shoulders of the consumer.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am very glad to hear the Senator from North Dakota express that sound faith; but I want to remind him just here that it is perfectly applicable to tariff taxes as well as to all others.

Mr. McCUMBER. Generally, yes. In some cases it is applicable to tariff taxes and in some cases it is not. I could go into the tariff question and show the difference, where in some cases the tax would be paid by the consumer and in other cases would not be so paid, depending upon whether there was or was not any competition in the home market on the particular article; but that is a big subject and it is unnecessary to be discussed in relation to this tax, which is not a tariff tax.

I do not believe that the American public are going to complain about a penny being put on the bill for a package that may be worth $20. I do not believe they are going to complain if we add another penny to the postage rates on first-class postal matter. For the individual it is extremely light, and yet in the sum total it amounts to a great deal and will assist very materially in raising the revenue which is required.

So, Mr. President, I want to insist that we can not levy a tax that will not fall upon the shoulders of the consumer in some form, and whether it be done directly or indirectly the final result will be always the same—the consumer will pay it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee as amended.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KNOX (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. I will inquire if he has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon has not voted.

Mr. KNOX. Then I withhold my vote.

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and therefore withhold my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (when Mr. SAULSBURY's name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. LODGE (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Georgia was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], who is on the committee with me, and as he would vote as I have already voted, in the affirmative, I allow my vote to stand.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I understand he has not voted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas has not voted.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. LODGE (when the name of Mr. WEEKS was called). My colleague [Mr. WEEKS] is absent from the city. He has a general pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. If present, my colleague would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the affirmative). I have already voted, but I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], who has not voted. I am informed, however, that if the Senator from Maryland were present he would vote as I have voted. Therefore I allow my vote to stand.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] and vote "nay."

Mr. WATSON (after having voted in the affirmative). My general pair, the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], not being present, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], who is absent. Therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. MYERS. I have a general pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], who is necessarily absent. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "yea."

Mr. KENDRICK. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "nay."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] and vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]; and

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 27, as follows:

YEAS—28.

Ashurst	Jones, N. Mex.	New	Simmons
Brandegee	Knox	Page	Smith, Mich.
Broussard	Lodge	Pittman	Smith, S. C.
Dillingham	McCumber	Pomerene	Smoot

So the amendment of the committee as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I give notice that I shall reserve this question for a separate vote in the Senate, and shall ask a separate vote in the Senate when we have a good attendance of the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I ask that we may take up now the paragraph on page 76 dealing with bank checks.

The SECRETARY. On page 76, after line 3, the committee proposes to insert the following:

7. Bank check, draft, or certificate of deposit not drawing interest, or order for the payment of any sum of money, drawn upon or issued by any bank, trust company, or any person or persons, companies, or corporations at sight or on demand, 1 cent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I move to strike out the word "check" on line 4.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 76, line 4, it is proposed to strike out the word "check" and the comma following it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Kansas a question?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I think I am in entire accord with the Senator if the amendment will have the effect evidently intended; but would not checks be included in the words "or order for the payment of any sum of money," so that if checks were not specifically mentioned would they not, in fact, be included by the language that follows?

Mr. CURTIS. I am afraid they would, Mr. President.

Mr. STERLING. Why not insert the words "other than checks" at that point, then?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. May I suggest to the Senator from Kansas that we reject the whole amendment?

Mr. CURTIS. I should be very glad to have it rejected.

Mr. SMOOT. Then there will not be any question about checks or drafts or certificates of deposit or any other evidence of payment, in the form of order or otherwise.

Mr. CURTIS. I will withdraw my amendment to the committee amendment because I believe we can defeat the committee amendment, and this will accomplish the purpose I desire.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the committee amendment is withdrawn. The question is on the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I think there is less excuse for this tax than any other tax. The bankers in my State would much prefer to have this additional tax put on them, on their capital, than to have the trouble of each man, just because he takes his money out of the bank, putting a 1-cent stamp on the checks. You might as well tax a man for putting it in and putting it in the channels of trade as to tax him 1 cent for taking it out; and if you taxed him 1 cent to put it in, how many of them would put their money in the banks?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, as stated a moment ago, I withdrew the amendment on the theory that we could defeat the whole committee amendment, and we would accomplish what we desire thereby.

Mr. OVERMAN. I hope the Senator will insist upon his amendment. I am against the whole amendment, as far as that is concerned; but in the case of bank checks, we know how disagreeable it was to the small depositor during the Spanish-American War. The large depositor does not care much about this, but it is the small depositors that feel it. They take their money out of the channels of trade when it ought to go into the channels of trade. You might as well tax me for putting my money in my iron box and taking it out. The depositor puts it there without getting any interest from the bank. It is just for the convenience it affords and for the protection of his money; and you ought not to make him pay this tax of 1 cent just to take his money out of the bank.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am a member of the Committee on Finance; and in the committee, when this item was finally agreed upon, I gave notice that I should reserve the right to oppose this part of the bill.

I am utterly opposed to the taxing of bank checks or bank drafts or certificates of deposit.

Some 10 years ago there was an endeavor made on the part of business men in the East to encourage just as much as possible the depositing of small amounts in banks. It had the tendency of creating a spirit of saving among the people; and the country banks, while undertaking this splendid piece of work, never charged in any way for the check books that they issued to the depositor or for any service they might render in assisting the depositor by way of exchange or otherwise. Small banks have been established in towns of as low as 500 population. To-day, where there were only 2 or 3 banks in some of the Western States in former years, we find as high as 20 or 30 banks in counties alone. There is hardly a town with a population of over 500 people now but that has its local bank. There are small places of two or three thousand people that have two banks, and this system has been built up by encouraging the people of those small places to save their money and put it in a safe place. The untold hundreds of millions of dollars that used to be put in boxes and chests at home are now in circulation through the banks and are necessary for the expansion of the business of the Nation. If we undertake now to impose a tax upon every check, whether it be for a dollar or whether it be for $10,000,000, it will only have a tendency to interfere with the splendid work that has been accomplished by bringing into circulation the money that in the past has been held out of circulation. It is for that reason that I am opposed to this provision.

I do not know that it makes very much difference to banks that charge, for every deposit that is under $100, so much per month. Checks issued upon such banks are generally for large amounts. In the great cities of this country, if you compare the amount of business handled with the amount of business in the little banks, and then compare the amount of checks for that business in the large banks with the amount in the little banks, I will guarantee that there are 100 checks issued on the small bank where there is one issued on the large banks of the country. Therefore it is an unjust tax, and I sincerely hope the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I hope the committee amendment will not prevail. We have been through one experience with a tax on bank checks. The tax was vexatious and troublesome and annoying, and hardly paid the cost of collection. I do not know, and I do not undertake to state, the exact results financially, but there was no considerable amount of money realized. I do not think the indirect injury we will do to the business of this country through the withdrawals that we may cause from banks in this country will possibly be compensated by any small amount of money that we might raise by the imposition of this tax. It would not be so hard on rich people who draw large checks and who would care nothing for the small amount of the tax.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, while the Senator is talking on this subject, I want to give an example of what occurred in the days when we had this tax during the Spanish War. Depositors took their money out of the bank and put it in an iron box, and put the iron box in the vault, and took out their cash from time to time. Instead of letting the money go into the bank, and thus into the channels of trade, they took the money and put it in their boxes in the bank, and took it out themselves, instead of issuing a check for it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Exactly.

Mr. STONE. Where did that occur?

Mr. OVERMAN. Why, it occurred in North Carolina, and in every other State in the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. Why, of course.

Mr. STONE. No; it did not.

Mr. OVERMAN. It occurred in Missouri. It was a common thing.

Mr. STONE. The Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, that is likely to occur in most places where there are small bank accounts and small deposits. Of course, it will have no effect on large accounts and on rich men; but the people who have very small bank accounts, and pay their small bills with small checks, will be very much affected by this sort of a tax. After all it is the great aggregate of those small people who make the sum total of the Nation's banking capital. There are so many more of them that they mount up when you consider them in the aggregate.

Mr. President, I can not see, to save my life, why we can not give the bankers of this country some credit for patriotism and common sense; and I do not know a single banker in my State, from the biggest one in it to the smallest one, who has not protested against this tax, although it does not come out of him, because they say, every one of them, that it is unwise and unsound business policy, and has a tendency to keep people from taking their money to the banks and using the banks.

I believe that indirectly this tax will do this country a vast sight of harm, that will more than balance any good that might come from it, or any amount of revenue that we might raise by it. I think it is annoying, provoking, and irritating. I do not think the amount of money that we are likely to raise from it will compensate either for the indirect injury that may flow from it or for the nagging of the people by any such useless tax as this. Therefore, I hope the Senate will strike it out, and not agree to the committee's proposal.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I was one of the members of the committee who voted for this tax on bank checks. We used the stamp tax on bank checks in the Civil War and we used it in the Spanish War. It seemed to me that it was a tax easy of collection, inexpensive to collect, and one that fell only on people who had money, because they all had bank accounts. The amount in each case is very small.

With the argument that there are large classes of people in this country who should pay no taxes at all I have no sympathy, for I think that under a democracy everybody should pay his share, if it is only a few cents a year, just as I believe that those who have the most and make large profits should pay enormous taxes if necessary; but I do not believe it is a sound democratic principle to say that a tax must not be laid because there are a great many voters who will have to pay it.

The argument made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] is a much more important argument, and that is that it would tend to decrease the habit of placing small deposits in banks. It is very desirable, of course, I fully admit, that we should encourage in every way taking money from private hoards or private places and putting it in banks and getting it into circulation. It encourages thrift and is an aid to business; but I can not believe that this would have any very large effect in that direction. It is so trifling in amount in each case that I do not believe that it would have much effect in that way. It is the only tax in this bill about which I have had many letters urging its imposition—not from banks, of course, but from people generally.

I have always felt, as I say, that this is a fair tax, and I am unable to see that it is not a reasonable tax, which would fall on people who are entirely able to pay it; and I do not believe that the danger of withdrawals—which would be a serious one if it were real—has much weight. I do not think it would effect withdrawals. If it should cause withdrawals of large amounts from small banks and injure the small banks, I admit that that would be a very serious objection, because I suppose that many of the banks are so small that to pay the stamp tax themselves would be a serious burden; but it appears to me now, as it did in the committee, that it is a reasonable method of raising money. It is estimated that it will raise about $10,000,000.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts, when the stamp tax was in existence before, if it ever caused the withdrawal of money from banks?

Mr. LODGE. I heard it said, at the time of the repeal of the stamp tax after the Spanish War, that the country banks were against it because they thought it led to some withdrawals. I think the habit of using bank checks is much more deeply fixed now than it was then, however, and I do not believe, as I say, that it would cause any serious withdrawals.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that the citizens of this country ought to pay some tax; but I think the Senator from Massachusetts overlooks the fact that this is a flat rate and that the man who is able to draw a check for a million dollars pays the same amount that is paid by the man who draws a check for a dollar or less; so it can not be said to be a just tax.

It is undoubtedly true, as the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] has stated, that to impose a tax upon the people of small means, the people who necessarily do not have to deposit their money in banks because they have no business, would be burdensome to them, and it would discourage depositing money in banks. Of course, any man who knows anything about banking, at least in a small way, knows that that is true. But more than that, Mr. President, the greatest objection I have to this tax is that it discourages thrift. It discourages the man of small means from saving his money and putting it where it ought to be, in the bank, and getting it into circulation. Instead of putting their money into banks they will put it into stockings and it will be lost, or they will squander it in some way. There is nothing, I believe, that will encourage this more than to induce and invite the people to deposit their money in some place where it will pay. We know that by encouraging the people of limited means to deposit their money in commercial banks or postal savings banks it has been one of the greatest means to encourage trade.

That is my main objection to the proposition. I have no objection to taxing bank drafts. I am perfectly willing that a banker should be compelled to pay a tax upon any draft he may issue or upon certificates of deposit. That tax would be paid by the bank and not by the depositor. But I do insist that it is a mistake to impose this tax, small though it may be, upon the man who draws a check for a dollar, or perhaps less than that, and impose the same rate and the same kind of a tax upon a man who does not have to exceed $5 in bank that you impose upon a man who has a million dollars in bank and may draw a check for a million dollars. It is an unjust tax, and I am opposed to it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, we have had this same tax on bank checks proposed every time a revenue bill has come before the Congress in the last four or five decades. It is true it is an easy way to collect taxes; it is true it is an inexpensive way to collect taxes; but I do not agree, and I have never agreed, with the policy of levying this tax. In the first place, I have always believed that the estimate of the amount of revenue that can be raised under the tax has been exaggerated. My recollection is that when this tax was levied during the time of the Spanish War the amount of tax that actually went into the Treasury was a little rise of a million dollars. Of course the increased amount of business in the country, the increased policy of the people to use the banks, would increase the amount of tax now to be collected under the pending bill.

I think, though, the estimate of the committee that this tax would bring something in the rise of $7,000,000 is far from a correct estimate. I doubt very much as to whether this tax levied to-day would bring one-half of that sum. I think it has a tendency undoubtedly to prevent the deposit of money in banks. As to how far that tendency will go and how much money it will keep out of the banks I am not able to determine, and I do not know anyone who possesses the information who could actually determine it.

But I have always opposed this proposition, because I regard it as a bad public policy. The effort to levy this tax has always been opposed by newspapers or men who represented the great wealth of the country. I know the great wealth of the country feels that it is being burdened and is going to be burdened with taxation. People with great wealth ought and must bear some of the burdens of government. I agree to that proposition. I believe that every man under the flag ought to do his part, and especially during war conditions.

The idea is given out to the country that this is a tax on wealth. It is not a tax on wealth; it is a tax on a business facility. If it was a tax on wealth, you would provide that a tax of 1 cent should be levied on every $10 that was drawn from a bank. If $10 is drawn from a bank in one check, under the amendment it would be 1 cent; if $100 is drawn from a bank in checks of $10 each, it would be 10 cents; but if it is drawn from the bank in one check of $100 it is only 1 cent. So it is not a tax on wealth; it is a tax on the opportunity to do business in a certain way; that is, to do it through a bank. It is not taxing a man's money. The check drawn for $100,000 pays no more tax than the check drawn for $5. I am not opposing it because it makes the people of small means pay a small tax to the Government—and it is a small tax—but I oppose this proposition because it is a bad public policy.

It has been stated by men of high authority that $1 in bank will pay ten times the amount of indebtedness that $1 in the pockets of the people will pay.

The purpose of that currency is to facilitate business transactions. It is a medium of exchange; it is to facilitate the trade of people and the carrying on of business. It is not only in the interest of the rich but it is manifestly in the interest of the poor; it should be a part of the policy of the Government to grant a ready facility to do business.

When you say to the small depositor that you put your dollar in bank, but when you draw it out you get 99 cents, if it is a $1 check, he becomes alarmed about the situation. But when you say to him, "If you put your money in the bank we take care of it, we keep the thief away, the danger of fire away, and we give it back to you just as you put it in," we encourage him to bring his money to the bank instead of locking it up in his trunk at home.

All recall the argument which was made here when we had the postal savings bank before the Congress of the United States. You recall the accurate statement of Government officials as to the vast amount of money that was held in the pockets of the people and not put in bank. The establishment of the postal savings-bank system was to bring that money out of hiding and out of hoarding and put it where it could be used to facilitate the trade and business of the country. You established a great banking system by the Government of the United States solely for that purpose.

This provision of the bill would reverse the engine on that question. It would turn back the lever and instead of encouraging the masses of the people to deposit their money in banks to facilitate business transactions you propose to put a tax, even small though it be, to stand as a barrier against their doing what has been the policy of the Government ever since we established a banking system.

If you really want to tax the money of the country in the banks, provide a tax of 10 cents on every $10 drawn out, whether drawn in one check or whether drawn in a thousand checks, and you will get some revenue. You will then have a tax on the money of the country, and instead of producing probably three or four million dollars produce forty million dollars. But that would be equally as bad a policy as the policy of this amendment. If you wrote the tax in that way, to tax all men equally in proportion to the amount of money they had in bank, you would hear a protest go up from one end of the country to the other that would sweep such a provision off the legislative field at once.

So I think the part of wisdom undoubtedly is to defeat this committee amendment and keep this tax out of the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not know so much about what the conditions are in cities and in larger banks, but I think I do know what the effect of this amendment, if enacted into law, would be in the medium-sized cities and upon the country banks. It is true that the tax would be easily collected, and that it would be collected without much expense. I think those two things can be said in favor of this kind of a proposition. In my opinion, from my knowledge of the conditions of the country with which I am familiar, I believe the enactment of this amendment into law would interfere very seriously with business transactions and drive a great deal of money out of circulation, and do much more damage than the good that would be accomplished by the collection of this tax.

The tax is small, but it is not graduated so that it is fair at all. I think that must be apparent to everybody, because, as the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] said, the tax on a check of one dollar would be the same as the tax on a check of a thousand or a million dollars.

But I wish to call attention to what to my mind is a serious objection to it. It is that it will drive money out of the banks and hence out of circulation; that it will cause people to cease paying their bills with checks. Throughout the country with which I am familiar at least, banks have been in the habit for several years now of advertising the method and advising the people to do business and pay their bills through the instrumentality of bank checks. You can scarcely pick up a paper in which a so-called country bank has an advertisement but what it will call attention in that advertisement to the desirability of paying bills through the instrumentality of bank checks, calling atention to the fact that the check when a customer gets it back will be a receipt, and that it will avoid difficulty, and they will not be called upon to pay bills twice, because the check preserved would be a receipt for the money received.

There is not any doubt, Mr. President, that these advertisements throughout the country have been the means of millions of dollars being deposited in banks in order that bills may be paid through the instrumentality of bank checks. I know it is a common thing, where I am familiar with the way business is done, for bills to be paid in that way.

Since this bill has been pending I happened to be at a little meeting of people here in Washington where they were discussing this very question. I remember hearing two or three in that discussion express the opinion that if this provision went into the law they would pay no more bills with checks. In the cities with which I am familiar and in Washington it is the custom for people to pay their gas bills, their electric-light bills, or their grocery bills, and all similar bills every month through bank checks. One of those people I heard say at that little gathering—it was not called for any particular purpose, it was accidental—that "if this provision becomes a law it means that I pay no more bills with checks."

Senators may say it will only amount to a small sum. That is true, but you must remember we are confronted now with living expenses that are enormous, and we have been taught, from the White House down through all the Government officials the advice has gone forth, economize, save every penny. Patriotic people are trying to do it, and although to the man of wealth it might seem queer that a man or woman paying bills would for the sake of saving 10 or 15 cents a month walk 3 or 4 miles and keep the money at home instead of in the bank, it will be true nevertheless; thousands and thousands of people will do that very thing.

Now, what does that mean, Mr. President? It means that this money instead of remaining in actual circulation will be locked up 90 per cent of the time. It means that when the small depositor gets $50 which he would ordinarily deposit in a bank he will keep it in his pocket or put it in a box. It means that the banking facilities will not be utilized as they are being utilized now and as they have been for several years past.

This great agitation on the part of the banks always seemed to me was a worthy one, to advise people to pay their bills with checks. It is a good business proposition to always have a receipt when you pay out money, as you always do when you pay it with a check. They have been advised to do that for years; they have been practicing it, and they like that kind of business. It is good economy for them, and it is a good thing for the banks and a good thing for the country, because it keeps the money in active circulation all the time.

It seems to me, as I said, that while this tax could be collected easily it would be a great economical error, a mistake to put this provision in the bill and tax bank checks even though the tax be small.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I ask consent at this time to have printed in the RECORD certain letters I have received from newspapers of my State regarding the discriminatory tax proposed to be imposed upon advertising matter and the increase in second-class mail rates.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the matter will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE KNOXVILLE SENTINEL,
Knoxville, Tenn., May 12, 1917.

Senator JOHN K. SHIELDS,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR SHIELDS: In answer to your courteous letter of the 9th and your telegram of the 11th, before your telegram was received I sent you a wire regarding the proposed war-tax bill.

Please understand at the outset that the Sentinel is perfectly willing to bear its fair proportion of the tax necessary to raise the additional revenue of the Government.

We believe, however, that the tax levied should be at a fixed percentage of the net profits of this and other newspapers, and that no burdens should be placed upon the processes that produce the profits.

As I wired you the other day, the expense incident to the publication of all newspapers has within the past year increased enormously. We are paying more for help in all departments, some of our supplies have doubled and trebled in cost, and the largest item of expense in the way of supplies—that is, newsprint paper—has increased from 60 per cent to 100 per cent. In New York the other day, in discussing the probable price that we would be charged next year for news print, I was led by the manufacturers to conclude that prices would be still further advanced for 1918.

It seems to me that there is every good reason why, under the conditions the newspapers are forced to operate at present, they should not have a tax on advertising, and I understand that this feature of the bill has already been eliminated, and there should be no increase in postage rates, which form of distribution is so vitally essential to a wide circulation of the newspapers.

You will understand, I am sure, that this extra cost can not easily be passed on to the consumer. Our mail subscriptions are all paid for in advance and the rates fixed for the ensuing year. As it happens in the case of the two Knoxville newspapers, perhaps 75 per cent or more of their mail circulation expires in December and January and at that time are renewed for 12 months at very low prices.

To-day we are selling the Sentinel on the rural routes at $3.50 per year. This price just about pays for the white paper and postage. We can not now go to these same subscribers and demand of them that they help share the additional cost of increased postage rates.

Finally, if the newspapers are required to pay double postage rates, in self-defense they must add the increase to the cost of their subscription rates. The higher the price of newspapers, the fewer people who will subscribe to them, and the more restricted their circulation becomes the less efficient the rural routes.

Surely, if the postage rates are doubled, the newspapers wherever they can will use the express companies more largely than they are now doing, and always in preference to the mails, thereby eventually reducing their business with the post office to no inconsiderable degree.

The Sentinel, through the secretary of the Southern Newspaper Publishers' Association, expressed a willingness to donate a liberal quantity of its advertising space, its news and editorial columns to the Government, to be used for the benefit of its recruiting officers, free of all charge. I believe that the rank and file of the newspapers of the country have indicated a willingness to cooperate along these lines and that the Government should not at this time place any onerous burdens upon the press.

It seems to me that the war-tax bill as it relates to newspapers, if not actually confiscatory, is altogether discriminatory. Both Knoxville newspapers in their issues of to-day have editorials upon the subject if you care to read them.

Let us pay a fair percentage of our incomes and profits, but do not double the postage rates, which action would almost, if not quite, put out of business a large number of the smaller newspapers and would result practically in confiscating their property.

Yours, very truly, C. B. JOHNSON.

THE JOURNAL AND TRIBUNE,
Knoxville, Tenn., May 12, 1917.

Senator JOHN K. SHIELDS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The proposed increases of various kinds which would fall on newspapers, as I understand it at present, involve four different expenses—first, increase in postage rates; second, proposed tax of 5 per cent on advertising receipts; third, proposed 10 per cent tariff on paper; fourth, proposed excess profits taxes.

The general and principal reason which applies to all of these items is the fact, which is a matter of common knowledge, that the newspapers have been hit by the war more than any other industry, owing to the abnormal price of paper. I will give you the figures in our particular case.

Last year we purchased paper at $2.20 per hundred pounds delivered at Knoxville, and the paper bill for 1916 was $44,700. Our contract for 1917 has a price of $3.25 at the mill, which, with freight and other onerous conditions which the paper manufacturers have put in their paper contracts, means practically $3.65 delivered in Knoxville, or an increase of 66 per cent, which means, on the basis of the same consumption of paper in 1917 as we used in 1916, an increase expense to us of $29,500.

At that, it is difficult to get enough paper to supply our needs, and prices in the open market are still higher. I inclose you herewith a copy of a telegram received day before yesterday in response to an inquiry for price on two cars, quoting us $4.75 delivered at Knoxville, or more than double last year's price. Paper can not be bought in open market at all at any reasonable price. For a paper of this size you can understand what the increased expense account of this size will amount to.

It is difficult to raise advertising rates, as they are based on circulation, and advertising ceases to become profitable to an advertiser when it costs him more than a certain amount per thousand readers. We have made some slight raises in our subscription price, which only reimburse us a fraction of the above extra paper expense. In addition to this, prices of ink, metal, labor, and all materials going into the construction of a newspaper have also advanced largely.

It is impossible for newspapers to make fluctuations in their circulation and advertising rates, as is the case with the merchant, who can change his prices from day to day according to cost price.

In addition to the above, owing to uncertain war conditions, there is already an indication of contraction of business by retail merchants and a reduction of advertising on account of uncertainty, and we anticipate a great further falling off in advertising receipts. Under present conditions, the question with the average newspaper already is whether or not they can break even during 1917, and the prospects of still further burdens is an appalling one.

It seems to me that if the Government takes its taxes out of the net income of profits which they make, in the same way they do any other business, that they will have gotten a fair portion of taxes from the newspapers without resorting to special and extra taxes on them, which will probably mean that the net income of newspapers will be absolutely eliminated, with a much greater chance that they will show a loss. We fail to understand why newspapers should be treated differently from any other line of business in this respect. We do not object to paying the same proportion of our profits that every other line pays, if we make those profits, but we do object to special taxes on us which will amount to confiscation of all profits and serious danger of heavy losses.

In reference to the proposed doubling of second-class postage rates in the first zone and a further increase in more distant zones, our total postage bill for papers mailed during the year 1916 was $6,238. The proposed new rate would mean an increase to us of more than 100 per cent, as the rate would be double on most of it and triple on part of it. This would mean an additional expense to us of probably $8,000 per annum.

It is impossible to put prices high enough on subscriptions to transfer this tax to the reader. Part of it might be done, and this would mean reduced circulation and reduced advertising rates and a curtailment of newspaper reading by the general public, which would be an injury to the country. We send some papers by express to agents along the railroad lines, and we understand these shipments are also proposed to be taxed.

The tax on such things as theater tickets and hundreds of other proposed taxes can be transferred directly to the consumer by the seller, and will doubtless be done in most cases, but the newspapers are to a large extent powerless to pass this burden along, consequently it puts it in the class of confiscatory class legislation.

The proposed tax of 5 per cent on the gross advertising receipts of the newspapers is something that I have not heard of being proposed in any other line. In many lines, such as the wholesale grocery line, tax of this sort would wipe out the entire profits, as many of them do not make a net profit of 5 per cent on their sales. Why this should be applied to newspaper and not other lines we are also unable to understand.

This tax, based on advertising carried in the Journal and Tribune would cost us in the neighborhood of $7,500 per annum additional, which could not be transferred to the advertiser for the reasons above explained, that advertising ceases to be profitable to advertisers above a certain price per thousand circulation.

Advertising is not an absolute necessity for many merchants, as a number of them do without it entirely, and if this extra charge were put on them they could simply drop out. This is another condition peculiar to the newspaper business, as we are not delivering any necessities which the public must have, and are not in position to place any price on the same which we see fit.

As to the excess profit tax, there does not seem to be much chance of our getting any excess profit, so that it does not worry us much, but as stated above, the income tax and excess profits tax which applies to all lines of business would also apply to us, and we are willing to pay the same as other people are paying, but can not see why we are picked out for slaughter.

In further reference to the postage matter, as I advised you some time ago, I think the sooner we get this on the zone basis the better, as it is manifestedly unfair to charge a publication like the Saturday Evening Post 1 cent a pound to carry their papers from Philadelphia to Los Angeles and charge the Journal and Tribune the same price for an average haul of about 30 miles. In papers of this size the bulk of the circulation is within 75 miles, and if they can hold the postage rate down to the present price to a zone of probably 75 or 100 miles, the burden would not be great and it would be a more equitable way to make the long-haul paper pay the price and the short-haul papers remain as at present.

Another expense, it seems imminent to us, is the 10 per cent tariff on paper. It so happens we are buying our paper in Canada and are contracted with this mill for the year 1917. Will probably have to buy from them also in 1918, as no paper manufacturers have been making contracts except with their old customers, and a price can not be secured from any other. This will mean a probable additional expense to us of $7,000 per year. Our competitor buys in the United States and will be saved this expense.

There are many southern papers in our condition; that is, buying from Canadian mills. The ones that happen to be doing this would be picked out for this additional burden, whereas those that happen to be buying from the American mills would not be touched.

To sum up the matter, the increase of cost of paper, coupled with the proposed various additional taxes and the other increased cost of doing business of all kinds, will amount to a grand total of $50,000 per annum, which is far above the normal average profits of a paper of this size, which makes the whole proposition appear as if the end of newspaper business were in sight.

Trust you will agree with me that it is obvious that the facts and figures in the above statement are correct and hope that the Congress will decide to let the papers pay their share of tax out of profits, if they are allowed to make them, the same as any other line of business.

Respectfully submitted.

I am, sincerely yours, A. F. SANFORD.

THE CHATTANOOGA TIMES,
May 9, 1917.

Hon. JOHN K. SHIELDS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In to-day's dispatches I notice the new revenue bill contemplates taxing newspapers 5 per cent on their advertising receipts and increasing by 100 per cent the postal rate for newspapers in the first zone, which is within 200 miles of the office of publication. Why newspapers should be singled out among all the business interests in the United States for this extraordinary tax on their receipts is beyond any of us to comprehend. This is class legislation of the most drastic and vicious sort. Of the many hundreds, and I might say thousands, of commercial pursuits in the United States, this bill says to the publisher of the newspaper that you, and you alone, shall pay a direct tax to the Government upon your receipts. It is unfair, unjust, and unreasonable, and can not be defended either in law or in morals. It would be just as fair to single out the business of mining or manufacturing of any sort or a commercial enterprise of any kind and say to any one of these that you shall pay to the Government for the privilege of conducting your business 5 per cent of your entire receipts, and it might say to any one of them in relation to their freight or express charges that you shall pay to the Government 100 per cent additional for the freight or express charges on whatever you may ship, whether you prepay it or not.

No consideration seems to be given to the already increased costs of newspaper publication, which makes the business a perilous and hazardous one to undertake. Increased wages in practically every department, the from 50 per cent to 75 per cent increased cost of white paper, and other added expenses makes the difference between income and expenditure so exceedingly small now that this 5 per cent tax on advertising receipts and the doubling of the postage charge may very easily, in a large number of cases, tip the scale to such an extent that the expenditure will greatly exceed the income, thereby causing a serious loss to the publisher. The fact is that every publisher is now struggling to as nearly as possible equalize the two, as is evidenced in so many instances by the raise in the subscription rate of most all publications. Where formerly there were hundreds of 1-cent newspaper publications in the United States, increased costs have necessitated the raising of the price to 2 cents, which in many instances does not cover the additional cost of white paper alone, so that now the 1-cent newspaper is a rarity.

I certainly hope that when this bill comes before the Senate, if it should still contain the provisions to which objection is here made, that you will oppose them and fight them to the bitter end. The spirit of nagging and revenge for whatever grievances, and they are mostly fancied, is out of place in this time of national trouble and peril, and our representatives in Congress should rise above any such mean or sordid motives and legislate in fairness, in justice, and in reasonableness to all.

May I ask you to give me an acknowledgment to this letter, with a statement, if the asking is not too presumptious, of what position you will take when this bill comes before the Senate?

With assurances of my highest respect and regard, and with my very best wishes to you personally, I am,

Very sincerely, yours, H. C. ADLER.

THE CHATTANOOGA TIMES,
May 15, 1917.

Hon. JOHN K. SHIELDS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: This morning I wired you as follows, which I now beg to confirm: "Let me suggest that newspaper second-class mail rate remain at present rate where the subscription price for the publication is the same in the country as it is in place of publication, and that where a newspaper cuts its subscription price going by mail it should pay an increased mail rate, say, the rate as in present bill."

There is no doubt that if the mail rate were increased as embodied in the House bill it would be ruinous to a very large number of newspaper publications. At the same time the Government, as an argument on its side as it relates to certain newspaper publications, which, in order to obtain large circulations in the territory adjacent to, but not inside of its place of publication, cut their rates to such an extent that a newspaper which maintains its subscription price is driven out of the field. When a newspaper, in order to obtain its largely increased circulation, cuts its subscription rate from 33⅓ per cent to 50 per cent below what it is charging the people in the city where it is published, it is not entitled to the consideration in this second-class mail rate matter. For instance, I have before me the subscription rates of three newspapers. They are as follows:

	Per year.
No. 1:
City subscribers	$4.00
By mail	2.40
No. 2:
City subscribers	5.00
By mail	3.00
No. 3:
City subscribers	7.50
By mail	4.20

You will observe that there is a vast difference between subscription rates in the cities of publication and by mail. There is no excuse for this difference, and it should not be permitted by the Government, the facts being that the mail subscriber costs more to get than the city subscriber costs, and yet a vast difference as you will observe, is made in the charge to these different classes of subscribers.

It is quite true that the increased cost of newspaper publication in the past 12 months has made this class of business quite a risky one, but that does not serve as an excuse for any newspaper to attempt to deliver to a mail subscriber the publication at a price somewhat less than the cost of the newspaper amounts to. I give you this information so that when the bill comes to the Senate you may be in a position to take action along the lines suggested, should you desire to do so.

With assurances of my kindest regards and best wishes, I remain,

Very sincerely, H. C. ADLER.

THE COMMERCIAL APPEAL,
Memphis, Tenn., May 24, 1917.

Hon. JOHN K. SHIELDS and
Hon. K. D. MCKELLAR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: I am writing to you in regard to the proposed increase of newspaper postage which is being urged as a war tax, and I shall discuss the question briefly from the standpoint of this paper. What is true of our paper is true of such papers as the Courier-Journal; the Tennesseean, of Nashville; the Journal and Constitution, of Atlanta; the Times-Picayune, of New Orleans; and the Item, of New Orleans; the Dallas News; the Houston Post; and the Little Rock Gazette.

Our business is probably larger than that of any of the newspapers I have mentioned. The papers that would be more seriously burdened than ours are such as the St. Louis papers, the Kansas City Star, the Philadelphia papers, and the Boston papers.

I believe that under the present rate of postage the Government of the United States makes a good profit from hauling our papers. I am sure this is true as to the daily and the Sunday issues. It is probably true as to the weekly.

The Commercial Appeal has a circulation of about 75,000 daily, and the Sunday has a circulation around 120,000, and the weekly has a circulation of around 90,000.

Last year we paid the United States Government $31,000 paper postage. We paid the express companies about $15,000 for paper transportation. At our present circulation this year, under the present rate, we will pay the United States Government about $40,000 and the express companies about $18,000.

HOW OUR PAPER IS TRANSPORTED.

Our daily, which the Government transports, is routed in Government sacks in our own office; it is hauled to the depots in our own trucks and it is loaded into the cars without expense to the Government. Not over 500 papers a day are handled regularly through the post office. As to this daily circulation, all the Government does with about three-fourths of papers tendered to it is to convey them from Memphis to the destination point. At the destination points our agents in three-fourths of the deliveries are present when the train arrives; they take the papers from the depot platforms and then and there begin to make their deliveries. The rest of the deliveries, about one-fourth of the total number of papers handled by the Government, are delivered through the post office.

We have rural route daily subscribers. The route classifications are arranged at this office. If there are three routes from a post office the postmaster finds the papers all bundled for each route. He merely transfers them to the route box, and the rural free-delivery carrier makes the delivery.

The Sunday paper is handled much as is the daily. All the routing, sacking, weighing, and delivering to the train is done in this office. The weighing is the only thing that the Government does before the papers reach the train. More than one-half of our circulation on the daily and on the Sunday goes in bundles. The average number of papers in these bundles is about 25. A great many of the papers for near-by towns and cities are put in bundles of 100 and 200.

Now, as to the daily and Sunday, we are charged $1 per 100 pounds. The express companies convey our papers to any point within our circulation for 50 cents a hundred pounds, but we are required by the express companies to route and to weigh the papers in our office and to make delivery to them at the train. The express companies also expect our agent at the end of the route to take the papers from the train. In other words, the express companies charge us 50 cents a hundred for doing the same service the Government does for $1 a hundred. One might say that the Government gets the more expensive end of the traffic and the express companies the cheaper. It is true that the Government does get more single wrappers than do the express companies, but it is also true that the Government gets as many heavy bundles as do the express companies. The fact is, also, that our daily and Sunday are, for the greater part, delivered within a radius of 200 miles—50 per cent of the mail is delivered within a radius of 100 miles of Memphis.

The amount of the circulation the average American daily newspaper has beyond 250 miles is almost negligible. It is true that certain New York and Chicago papers, with expensively illustrated supplements, do send many papers a great distance, but this number is slight in comparison with the total mailing of these papers. I doubt that any New York paper has 15,000 daily circulation beyond a radius of 150 miles. I doubt that any Chicago paper has 5,000 daily circulation beyond a radius of 150 miles. I doubt that any New York Sunday paper and any Chicago Sunday paper has a Sunday circulation amounting to 25,000 beyond a radius of 250 miles.

I am sure that the Government makes money transporting our daily and Sunday. I am also sure that the Government does not lose money in any great sum on the dailies of New York and Chicago.

We have a weekly; it has a circulation of around 90,000. It is a combination of a newspaper and farm paper. It is a clean, carefully edited paper, which is subscribed for mainly by small farmers. I believe that the paper has been the means of bringing education and matters agricultural into the home life of a great many families. But I am making no claims because of service papers are doing. Service is the duty of every semipublic business and of every good citizen.

The weekly is routed in this office. It does not go through the post office; it is hauled to the trains in our wagons. In order to speedily get the weekly out, we pay the United States Government $8 a week for the time of two Government inspectors, who supervise the weighing of the papers. If we sent the papers to the post office these inspectors would have to do this work at the Government's expense, but we pay the Government for getting the weights upon which we pay freight. The weekly is routed by trains and by States. If we have a half dozen subscribers on a rural free-delivery route, those papers are put into one bundle and addressed to that rural free-delivery route.

On the weekly there is a comparatively small amount of work to be done in the mail cars. Many people in Oklahoma and Texas take our weekly. They are former Tennesseeans and small farmers. Our Texas papers are put in through Texas sacks, but the separation work for distribution is principally done in this office.

So, after all, you will see the Government charges us a dollar a hundred pounds for transporting our papers, and that three-fourths of the Government labor is merely transportation. The express companies do the same work for 50 cents a hundred. It is true that the Government does more business than the express companies do, but it is also true that the Government gets twice as much as the express companies get, and the express companies seek the business. The Government makes a profit on transporting our paper.

WHAT WE DO.

Twenty years ago the Commercial Appeal chartered a train that leaves Memphis every morning at 3 o'clock, and now goes as far as Huntsville, Ala. We guaranteed to the Southern Railway a certain amount of money for that train. The train finally became self-sustaining. But a few years ago, because of the high cost of railroad operation, the Commercial Appeal, in order to keep the train on, agreed to pay to the Southern Railway Co. a fixed amount every month. This we have done; this we are still doing. This train is of general service. It would not run—which we in a way chartered—unless we made up a deficit and we pay the United States Government postage for hauling our papers. The United States Government also takes advantage of this train and sends out an enormouse amount of first-class mail matter and parcel-post stuff. Because of this train the United States Government is enabled to cover out of Memphis all of east Mississippi, much of west Tennessee, and all of north Alabama before noon.

I do submit in this case that we are rendering more service to the Government than the Government is rendering to us.

For many years we maintained a 2 o'clock train from Memphis to Jackson, Miss., a distance of 200 miles. We paid the Government for the privilege of hauling our papers on our own train. The Government used the train for all of its other post-office products; and the communities were served by these trains. Except for the Commercial Appeal neither of these trains would have served as transportation mediums so long.

Under the proposed second-class section, as it came from the House, the "first zone" charge, until November, would be 1⅛ cents a pound; and second and third zones 1⅛ cents a pound.

I believe that the increases for all zones would average an increase of about 1½ cents a pound.

After November 1 the average increase would be 1⅞ cents.

This year we are paying postage to the Government at the rate of $40,000 a year. Assuming that our circulation holds at this figure, under the proposed increase our postage will be from $60,000 to $65,000.

In a word, the Government is increasing one cost element of our manufacturing 50 per cent.

Of course you are entirely familiar with what papers, like other business enterprises, must pay in the way of general taxes on profits. The Commercial Appeal is now paying a tax on its income. It is also paying a corporation-stock tax at the market value. This corporation-stock tax alone this year, at 50 cents a thousand market value, will cost us about $450.

Our paper is capitalized at $300,000. The fact is that $1,000,000 were put into the paper before it ceased to lose money. Even under present taxing methods the paper is paying to the Federal Government $40,000 paper postage and about $4,000 first-class postage, but I do not claim this to be a tax; but under the law as it stands we are due this year to pay to the Government corporation and income tax, etc., amounting to about $3,500. We have paid it in advance.

The proposed bill as it was originally drafted, exclusive of the 10 per cent tariff tax on white paper, would cost the Commercial Appeal an amount that would turn last year's profit into a deficit.

Under the proposed bill, newspapers, because of the peculiarity of their business, must pay a large sum on telephoning and telegraphing.

The zone system as it stood when it left the House and the initial increase, would put a burden upon American newspapers that I think is unfair and disproportionate to the burdens put upon other business.

My suggestion is this, if the Congress is determined to tax us on a postage schedule: Let the second-class postage remain at 1 cent a pound from the point of publication up to the end of a radius of 250 miles, and then have a gradual zone increase until the extreme zone in the United States is 2 cents.

To be entirely frank, I believe that any periodical of large general circulation could be transported without loss to the Government under these rates: A 2-cent maximum for the extreme zone, granting that it had a large circulation as far west as San Francisco.

TAX ON TRANSPORTATION.

This bill is a war-tax bill. If the newspapers are not paying sufficient postage, the adjustment should come from the Post Office Department.

But if this is a tax measure, I submit that newspapers should not be singled out from any other business enterprises, and a tax placed upon the elements that go into the manufacture of the product. The Government, for taxing purposes, puts us into a class, then, justifying its rate of taxation, it bases this rate upon a transportation charge. The proposition, then, to increase the freight rate on newspapers is outrageously discriminatory against newspapers, because the transportation companies themselves are asking a maximum rate of 15 per cent, and will be content with a maximum rate of 5 per cent.

If this is a matter of transportation, we should not be included in the war-tax measure. If we are in the bill for taxes, we should be there along with every other form of business.

We are willing to be taxed as any other business enterprise, but we ask merely the privilege of being permitted to do business. We are willing to come in along with every other form of business; we are just like any other business enterprise, and, therefore, we insist that we should not be overtaxed upon things that go into the production of our wares. Tax us just like you would the grocer, the banker, or any other corporation, either upon the value of our stock or upon our income, or both.

If this bill had been passed as originally introduced, it would have bankrupted about half the periodicals and newspapers in the United States, if they had persisted in doing business along progressive lines. Within the last two years every element in the production of a newspaper has increased in price.

The Senators themselves attempted to help us in the matter of white paper.

WE CAN NOT SHIFT THE BURDEN.

Some say that we should increase the price of our papers. Papers like the Commercial Appeal are all selling their papers at a rate which, in fairness to our readers, we can not increase.

Some of the papers are criticized because they have run their circulation at a loss in order to have it large, and then place the burden upon the advertiser.

We have always felt that our readers ought to pay a fair price for the paper. We are getting a fair price for the paper—15 cents a week for a single copy. Our circulation returns, therefore, have paid for our white paper, and we do not have to put the burden of this cost upon the advertiser. The advertiser can not afford to pay much more, because it would make his overhead charges too great. There is a point in advertising at which more money for more advertising will not produce a corresponding amount of business.

We are securing a fair rate for our circulation and are selling our advertising at a rate which is not burdensome to the man seeking to increase his business and to sell his wares. We are not a burden to the Government and we are not transferring any burden from the reader to the advertiser; nor are we giving one advertiser an advantage of the other one. Our rates, as are the rates of most American newspapers, are absolutely fixed. Complaint has been made in certain quarters that papers charge much more than their card rates for political advertising. The Commercial Appeal does not seek this sort of advertising, but when it is offered we take it just at the same rate we get for any other advertising.

We can not pass the burden that the Government proposes to put on us either to our readers or to our advertisers. We would have to absorb it, and the result of the absorption would be conducting our enterprise at a loss; and if we are worth anything as a public servant we would thereby reduce our power to serve.

Let us get the business into our office; let us circulate our paper, and then if there is a profit take for the Government whatsoever part of the profit it needs to carry on its business during the war. Newspapers are asking to be fairly dealt with, as are other business enterprises; this much and no more.

Respectfully,

C. P. J. MOONEY,
Managing Editor Memphis Commercial Appeal.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desire to detain the Senate for only a few minutes upon the pending question. I will say frankly to the Senate that the committee were divided upon this question, as indicated by the statement of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who is a member of the committee, and certain members who were opposed to this amendment reserved the right to oppose it upon the floor of the Senate notwithstanding the action of the committee. Other Senators who felt very much like the Senator from Utah did not reserve that right.

It has been stated, Mr. President, that the revenue derived from the tax on bank checks in the Spanish-American War was insignificant. That is a mistake. The tax then imposed was a tax of 2 cents, and that tax, according to the statement of the Treasury Department, yielded about $7,000,000. There was also a tax imposed upon bank checks during the Civil War, from which there was a considerable revenue derived.

The rate proposed in the Senate committee amendment is only half the rate carried in the Spanish War revenue war act. It is estimated that that 1 cent will raise $9,000,000, $2,000,000 more than the 2-cent rate imposed during the Spanish-American War. Of course, the reason for that is obvious to everyone. There has been a great development in the banking business of the country. Clearing house statements show that the increase has been fourfold.

It is stated, and stated correctly, that there was a protest, I might say quite a general protest, on the part of the bankers against this tax, but that protest came chiefly and especially from the smaller banks. They protested because they thought it would result in the falling off of their deposits. I think myself that they greatly exaggerated the effect upon their deposits of this little tax. Especially the larger banks made no such claim as that, but they protested because it would be a matter of inconvenience.

Mr. President, I wish to say in this connection that if we are to strike out of the bill everything in it against which there was a protest, we would have to strike the whole bill out. Of course, we understand that the bill levies very high, exceptionally high, phenomenally high, rates of taxes. The amount of money which the Government must have to meet the present situation is an enormous sum compared with any requirements of the Government in the past, and these demands of the Government can not be met except by unusually high taxes.

The protest against this particular provision probably was no greater than the protest against the average impositions in the bill. I do not say that everybody who is taxed under the bill has protested, but there is hardly a tax here imposed that somebody has not protested against, because, I do not care how strong the patriotic sentiment is, it is a part of human nature, however necessary the taxes may be to meet an exigency or an emergency, to try to avoid taxes so far as they are concerned and throw them off on somebody else's shoulders.

Mr. President, I do not question that this would be some inconvenience to the banks; I do not know but what it may possibly affect the deposits in some of the banks; but in this bill your committee felt that it must ignore some considerations that appealed to it. Otherwise it would have made very little headway in raising the money necessary.

Mr. President, I do not wish to pursue this subject any further. The committee considered it very thoroughly and voted upon it several times. Each time there was a very decided division in the committee. I am perfectly willing to submit the matter to the judgment of the Senate, and because there is a small attendance this afternoon I shall not call for the yeas and nays upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SMOOT. I am afraid we can not get a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Did the Senator from Mississippi call for the yeas and nays?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I make the point of no quorum, incidentally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	McNary	Simmons
Bankhead	Hardwick	Myers	Smith, S. C.
Beckham	Hollis	New	Smoot
Borah	Husting	Newlands	Sterling
Brady	Johnson, Cal.	Norris	Sutherland
Brandegee	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Swanson
Broussard	Jones, Wash.	Page	Thompson
Chamberlain	Kellogg	Pittman	Trammell
Colt	Kendrick	Poindexter	Underwood
Curtis	King	Ransdell	Vardaman
Frelinghuysen	La Follette	Saulsbury	Watson
Gerry	Lewis	Sheppard	Williams
Gore	Lodge	Sherman
Gronna	McKellar	Shields

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee, on which the yeas and nays have been requested. Is the demand seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] and vote "yea."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and vote "yea." I ask that this announcement of the transfer of my pair may stand for the remainder of the day.

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). Announcing my pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], I withhold my vote.

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MYERS. I have a general pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], who is absent. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER. I have a general pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], which I transfer to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] and vote "yea."

Mr. GERRY. I inquire if the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that that Senator has not voted.

Mr. GERRY. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York, which I transfer to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON]; and

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 38, as follows:

YEAS—22.

Colt	Jones, N. Mex.	Martin	Simmons
Fletcher	Kellogg	Nelson	Stone
Frelinghuysen	Kendrick	Newlands	Swanson
Gerry	Lewis	Page	Williams
Hale	Lodge	Pittman
Hollis	McCumber	Saulsbury

NAYS—38.

Ashurst	Husting	Norris	Smoot
Bankhead	Johnson, Cal.	Overman	Sterling
Beckham	Jones, Wash.	Poindexter	Sutherland
Borah	Kenyon	Pomerene	Thompson
Brady	King	Reed	Trammell
Chamberlain	La Follette	Sheppard	Underwood
Curtis	McKellar	Sherman	Vardaman
Gore	McNary	Shields	Watson
Gronna	Myers	Smith, Mich.
Hardwick	New	Smith, S. C.

NOT VOTING—36.

Brandegee	Gallinger	McLean	Smith, Md.
Broussard	Goff	Owen	Thomas
Calder	Harding	Penrose	Tillman
Culberson	Hitchcock	Phelan	Townsend
Cummins	Hughes	Ransdell	Wadsworth
Dillingham	James	Robinson	Walsh
Fall	Johnson, S. Dak.	Shafroth	Warren
Fernald	Kirby	Smith, Ariz.	Weeks
France	Knox	Smith, Ga.	Wolcott

So the amendment of the committee was rejected.

DEATH OF EX-SENATOR JOHN W. KERN.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, it is with very great personal sorrow that I have to announce to the Senate the death of the Hon. John W. Kern, late a member of this body as a Senator from Indiana.

I wish to say in this connection, Mr. President, that for 40 years, all of my adult life, John Kern and I were the closest and warmest of personal friends. The sharpness and bitterness with which political contests are conducted in Indiana is proverbial. In all the years of our acquaintance Mr. Kern and I belonged to opposite parties and politically were as wide apart as men can be, I presume; but in all those years there was never a word to mar the pleasant—yes, cordial personal relations that existed between us.

I first knew John Kern when he came to Indianapolis from the little town where he was reared, with the bloom of youth on his cheeks and the hopes and ambitions of young manhood in his heart. I saw him and knew him as he struggled through the earlier stages of what was to become a highly successful professional career. I have known him through all the vicissitudes that he encountered in later life. I knew him in all his political struggles; I knew him as an attorney and otherwise; I knew him man to man, and at the end of that 40 years my appreciation of his character and of his friendship was stronger and greater than it had been at the beginning. It is with unusual regret, Mr. President, that I have to announce his death to the Senate.

I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolutions.

The resolutions (S. Res. 120) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has learned with deepest sorrow of the death of Hon. John W. Kern, late a Senator from Indiana and as such a Member of this body. He was able and efficient as a Senator, tireless in his devotion to the interests of the public service, and his sterling qualities earned for him the friendship and esteem of his associates.

Resolved further, That the Senate voices its profound regret of his death, and directs that this expression of its respect for his memory be made a part of the record.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of Mr. Kern I move that the Senate now take a recess until Monday, August 20, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m., Saturday, August 18, 1917) the Senate took a recess until Monday, August 20, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

MONDAY, August 20, 1917.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, August 15, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gerry	Kellogg	Myers
Bankhead	Hale	Kendrick	Nelson
Brady	Harding	Kenyon	New
Brandegee	Hardwick	King	Norris
Calder	Hollis	Knox	Overman
Colt	Husting	La Follette	Page
Curtis	James	McCumber	Pittman
Dillingham	Johnson, Cal.	McKellar	Pomerene
Fletcher	Jones, N. Mex.	McNary	Ransdell
Frelinghuysen	Jones, Wash.	Martin	Robinson

Saulsbury	Shields	Smith, S. C.	Townsend
Shafroth	Simmons	Smoot	Vardaman
Sheppard	Smith, Ga.	Stone	Weeks
Sherman	Smith, Mich.	Sutherland

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of illness. I will state that he is paired with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. MYERS. My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. My colleague [Mr. HUGHES] is unavoidably absent owing to illness.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I will let this announcement stand for the present.

I also wish to announce the absence of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] on account of illness in his family.

Mr. MCNARY. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] on official business.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to state that the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] is absent on official business.

Mr. KING. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], and the senior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] are detained on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

FREEDOM OF IRELAND.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I present resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of citizens of Tacoma, Wash., in the nature of a petition, with a request that they be printed in the RECORD. I ask that they be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolutions are as follows:

Whereas the only government now in Ireland sanctioned by the mass of the people of Ireland—the provisional government of the Irish Republic—has, through its duly accredited representative, appealed to the Government and people of the United States for their active support of the demand of the Irish people for absolute independence; and

Whereas the joint resolution offered in the House of Representatives by the Hon. WILLIAM E. MASON, formerly Senator and now Congressman at Large from the State of Illinois, is designed to accomplish in practical and efficient form the object of that appeal; and

Whereas it has been announced in the public press, on the authority of the chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Relations, to which committee said joint resolution has been referred, that the same, not being a war measure, will not be reported to the House without direct instructions from the administration—meaning thereby, presumably, the Executive Department of our National Government: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, citizens of the United States and of the State of Washington, in public meeting assembled in the city of Tacoma on this 9th day of August, 1917, do hereby respectfully petition the Congress of the United States to act favorably on said joint resolution; and we do most respectfully and earnestly urge upon the representatives of this State in the Congress to take such action, separately and collectively, as will secure an early favorable report on said joint resolution and its adoption by both Houses; and be it further

Resolved, That we earnestly and respectfully urge upon the President of the United States that he may recommend to the Committee on Foreign Relations of the House of Representatives that the joint resolution in question be reported favorably at the earliest practicable moment.

MICHAEL DOWD, Chairman.
M. J. COSTELLO, Secretary.

RECENT TROUBLES IN EAST ST. LOUIS, ILL.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, bearing on the question of the trouble at East St. Louis, Ill., I have an article written by a distinguished citizen of Florida, a gallant ex-Confederate soldier, frequently referred to as the Nestor of the press of Florida—Hon. Frank Harris. I should like to have it printed in the RECORD. I think it will be instructive.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the article will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears none.

The article referred to is as follows:

[From the Florida Record.]

"EDITOR FRANK HARRIS, OF THE OCALA BANNER, WRITES OF THE NEGROES OF NORTH AND SOUTH.

"To the EDITOR ROCHESTER EVENING NEWS:

"A friend living in your city has mailed me a copy of the Evening Times under date July 16, containing a marked article entitled 'Negroes coming North,'

"I confess to you that I was not irritated, and perused the article more in sorrow than in anger, for I can feel but pity for those living either North or South who all their lives are condemned to go through the world nursing a blind, morbid, deep-seated, irrepressible prejudice.

"Just how one can manage to entertain a prejudice against a whole people—a people of his own race and lineage; a people fighting for and under the same flag and worshiping the same God—is beyond my power to analyze or comprehend.

"It seems a mockery that one could seriously entertain the belief that the southern people, or any considerable number of them, should make it either a business or a pastime to 'shoot, hang, or burn innocent negroes.'

"If this were true, this race could not have increased in population from 4,000,000 to four times 4,000,000 within the period of 50 years.

"And how is it possible for you to believe that they are held in a condition little less than slavery when in the same article you quote from the Age that within a period of 50 years the negroes in the South have accumulated farm lands to the amount of $2,000,000,000, farm implements to the value of one and a half billions, and have deposited in southern banks $2,000,000,000, for it is a well-known fact that the negro has yet to learn the lesson of frugality?

"If it be true that they are still held in a condition little less intolerable than slavery, think you that these accumulations were possible?

"You do a whole people an injustice.

"We of the South are not preternaturally a bad, intolerant, overbearing, oppressive, and certainly not a vicious or murderous people.

"If you were to come amongst us and become fairly well acquainted with us, you would find us a very good people; if not loving and lovable, we would at least average with the population of other sections.

"Pardon me for saying it, but we boastingly profess to spring from the loins of the very best stock that has ever landed on these shores, and the strain of our blood is the purest that flows in American veins.

"One ought to know that a section of country that can give birth to such a race of men as Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Patrick Henry, John Randolph, Henry Clay, John Rutledge, McDuffie, Andrew Jackson, Winfield Scott, Zachary Taylor, Andrew Johnson, Abraham Lincoln, Woodrow Wilson, and a thousand men like them can not possibly be wholly bad.

"And the sun shines on no more noble women than the women of the South. The mothers of these men prove this assertion.

"It must be confessed that we have a full share of race pride and a love for the pride of ancestry. We feel that we owe something to posterity.

"So believing, we feel it a sacred duty to stand unequivocally for race purity, race integrity.

"Is that a fiendish crime? Is it a crime at all? Is it one for which any race should be ashamed?

"We have only to cast our eyes across the border into Mexico, toward Central America, Cuba, Haiti, or San Domingo to measure the results of race impurity; so we are trying as best we can to avoid a like condition.

"We do not want the South—fair as any spot on God's domain—to become mongrelized. Why blame us?

"Should we be anathematized for that? Is it immoral? Is it un-Christian? Is it in contravention of God's ordinances or the very work of His hands?

"If it is any or all of these things then the whole people of the South need to be born again.

"All of my life I have lived in the South; have traveled through many States, and I make the statement with fingers uncrossed that I have yet to see a sign that reads: 'Negroes and dogs not admitted here.' Nor have I ever seen a person who would say on his honor that he had ever seen such a sign in any part of the South. I can, therefore, regard it but a fabrication.

"As God in his creation differentiated the races, making some white, some black, others red, and yellow, we must believe that he did so for some wise purpose.

"We know that he frowned upon race amalgamation among 'His chosen people' and inculcated among them the doctrine and precepts of race purity. And throughout the ages, in stress and storm, who does not honor the Jew for keeping his race separate and distinct? So we can not be made to believe that in carrying out his omnipotent designs that we are wholly sinful.

"It is true that in the South we have a segregation of the races. We have separate public schools, separate Sunday schools, separate churches, separate public conveyances, and separate hotels and boarding houses.

"The negroes first set the example, and in saying this we are not endeavoring to dodge the issue. They first cut themselves loose from the white churches and established separate churches of their own, presided over by their own ministers and their own bishops.

"They preferred to do this, and we were glad for them to do so. They felt less embarrassed, more free and independent.

"The establishment of separate schools was done under Republican administration in the South during the reconstruction era, and gave eminent satisfaction to all concerned.

"The separate conveyances for negroes are provided with the same furnishings and conveniences that the conveyances for the whites are provided with. The waiting rooms have identically like provisions.

"Can that just be described as a species of cruelty? It suits them better and it suits us better, and avoids friction, irritation, and at times, perhaps, violence. If they are satisfied with these conditions, and we are satisfied, why should it provoke spleen and ugliness from unconcerned outsiders?

"I make the following quotation from your article:

"As an instance of the wholesale exodus, Rev. A. J. James, of Ocala, Fla., discovered a couple of weeks ago that his entire parish had moved to New York. He followed them, and is organizing them into a church in the metropolis.

"Rev. A. L. James is still in Ocala and is pastor of his flock here.

"So what you say concerning him must be regarded as a fake.

"I am inclosing you a letter under his signature, written to the Evening Star of this city, which I hope that you will spare the space to reprint in your columns. You and your readers will see how far wrong you are.

"It is true, as he says, that he did go North to study conditions, but he returned, and, like Booker Washington, after traveling over the greater part of the world, was convinced that the South is the best place for the negro to work out his destiny—among the people he knows and who know him.

"But, speaking of race prejudice, do you come into the parliament of this discussion with clean skirts? Is not the history of the world the history of race antagonisms? Has it not existed as far back as history and tradition reach?

"Was there not antipathy between the Egyptians and Hebrews? Between the Jews and all other races? Are not whole pages of sacred history a recital of total annihilation or expulsion of races by races? And volumes of profane history tell the same story.

"After the Normans conquered England, did not the prejudices between the conquerors exist for a number of centuries? Was it not for a long time considered a disgrace for the proudest Norman knight to marry the richest Saxon princess? Race hatreds between the ancient population of Spain and the invading Goths lasted for 800 years. Between the Arabs and the Moors there was bitter enmity. Do not race antagonisms still exist in Europe and other parts of the globe?

"On this side of the Atlantic did we not drive the aborigines back and back and back until now they hardly have territory enough upon which to rest their feet? And many of the tribes have become totally extinct.

"Benjamin Lundy was the first one to start a newspaper to create a sentiment for the liberation of the slave. It is a little remarkable that he should have established it in the South, and as long as it remained here he was unmolested, but when he removed it from Jonesboro, Tenn., to Philadelphia it was burned by a mob.

"In 1784 Thomas Jefferson proposed an ordinance that after the year 1800 there should be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in any of the States. If the Northern States had voted for it, that ordinance would have been adopted.

"Was not William Lloyd Garrison mobbed in the streets of Boston? Was not Mr. Owen P. Lovejoy, a Presbyterian preacher, who next had the temerity to start an abolition newspaper, when he moved it from St. Louis to Alton, Ill., humiliated, and was not his office entered by a mob and his type, presses, and everything connected with it destroyed, and when he purchased a new outfit and in the third attempt, was he not mobbed and his printing plant burned?

"That was a long time ago, but was not the same spirit manifested at East St. Louis, Ill., within the past six weeks?

"And what about the history of Prudence Crandall? She taught the first negro school. It was at Canterbury, Conn. Samuel May, of your own city, was one who volunteered his services as one of her attorneys. The meeting refused to hear him. When her school was finally opened she was arrested for harboring young persons of color and was imprisoned in the county jail. Finally, an act of the legislature was passed prohibiting 'private schools for nonresident colored persons,' and the news of the passage of the act was received in Canterbury by the ringing of church bells.

"But why prolong the story?

"We have but a small community in Ocala, but we are living in comparative peace and harmony. We have but little, if any, friction between the races.

"Our colored population, as will be attested by Rev. A. L. James and others, are never afraid of molestation. They are conducting their businesses in the even tenor of their ways.

"It may be said that they are prospering, too.

"They have their own stores, and they are not mere shacks, either. Some of them are two-story brick buildings. They operate a bank of their own. It is a pretentious three-story brick building. They have a two-story brick hotel and a number of smaller hotels and boarding houses. They have a three-story knitting mill, built by their own efforts and conducted by themselves. It is proposed to be enlarged and will cover an entire block. They have two assembly halls, a gristmill, a moss factory, a moving-picture building, a cotton-ginning establishment, a velvet-bean huller, a large real estate agency, several contracting firms, market stalls, shoe shops, and other enterprises.

"They have their own physicians and dentists and a two-story brick hospital. They have an excellent public school, and 7 miles away is Fessenden Academy, conducted after the style of Tuskegee. They have a number of churches, one a large brick, and they are all nicely furnished. Many of them live in pretentious homes and enjoy the luxury of every modern convenience—electric lights, gas, baths, etc. They ride in automobiles and have their own society and social functions.

"And in this ambition for improvement they have the cordial good will of their white fellow citizens.

"After being clothed with the rights they now possess, Horace Greeley's advice was, 'Now root, hog, or die.' They are not dying.

"I shall close by saying that not a great while ago I was invited to make an address before our State press association, and in closing said:

"I can never forget the loyalty of the 'old slave' and his fidelity to the trust committed to his keeping during our Civil War period. In all civic transactions in our courts of justice I would plead for his race a 'square deal.' His attempts at right living should engage our solicitude and receive our encouragement."

"FRANK HARRIS."

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. NEW, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2701) to provide for the awarding of campaign badges to the members of Dental Corps, United States Army, and fixing the regulations for awarding same, reported it without amendment.

Mr. POMERENE, from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 2316) to promote export trade, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 109) thereon.

COAL, OIL, AND GAS ON THE PUBLIC DOMAIN.

Mr. MYERS. I introduce a bill for my colleague [Mr. WALSH], who is necessarily absent, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill (S. 2812) to encourage and promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, potassium, and sodium on the public domain was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PROPOSED INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION.

Mr. OWEN. I introduce a joint resolution proposing as a war measure an international convention for the purpose of terminating international anarchy, establishing international government in lieu thereof, and coercing the Teutonic military conspiracy by the organized commercial, financial, military, and naval powers of the world. I ask that the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 94) proposing as a war measure an international convention for the purpose of terminating international anarchy, establishing international government in lieu thereof, and coercing the Teutonic military conspiracy by the organized commercial, financial, military, and naval powers of the world was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 94) proposing as a war measure an international convention for the purpose of terminating international anarchy, establishing international government in lieu thereof, and coercing the Teutonic military conspiracy by the organized commercial, financial, military, and naval powers of the world.

Resolved, etc., That it is the opinion of the representatives of the people of the United States assembled in Congress that international government, supported by international force, should be immediately organized to take the place of the existing international anarchy; that competing armaments should be replaced by a noncompetitive international army and navy; that the Teutonic military conspiracy to dominate the world should be overthrown by the combined commercial, financial, military, and naval powers of the world.

That international government should be based upon the following principles:

First. Every civilized nation and informed people should have the unquestionable right of internal self-government, with exclusive control within its own territory over immigration, emigration, imports, exports, and all internal affairs, with the right to make its own political and commercial affiliations.

Second. The oceans and high seas should be free and open under international rules. All international waterways, straits, and canals should be open on equal terms to the citizens of all nations. Equal terms should be arranged for fuel, repairs, and dockage in all ports for the ships belonging to the citizens of all nations.

Third. All inferior nations having no seaports should have the right of shipment of their goods in bond on equal terms and conditions, without tax, through any intervening territory to the seaports of any other nation with equal access to shipping facilities.

Fourth. That there should be established by international agreement an international organization of all civilized nations with an international legislative council to draft rules of international law to be submitted to the several nations for approval. That when such rules of international law are approved by the parliaments or lawmaking branch of the governments of three-fourths of the member nations, representing three-fourths of the total population of all the member nations, such international rules should be binding on all member nations. Such rules should be limited to the powers expressly delegated to such international legislative council and strictly confined to international affairs.

Fifth. The international legislative council should elect and define the duties of a representative international executive cabinet to execute and enforce the rules established as international law.

Sixth. The international legislative council should have representatives from each member nation exercising a voting power according to relative population, relative wealth, and relative governmental development, to be determined by international agreement.

Seventh. The international legislative council should establish and define the duties of an international supreme court, with power to pass upon all questions of international controversy incapable of diplomatic adjustment but with no power to pass on questions affecting the reserved rights of nations.

Eighth. The international legislative council should formulate the method for raising an international army and navy and for establishing an international blockade and other means for enforcing the rights of member nations under international law, such army and navy to be provided and sustained by the member nations pro rata according to relative population and wealth.

Ninth. With the conclusion of the present war the nations of the world should agree to reduce in progressive stages their land and sea forces to a point preferably not to exceed internal or local police purposes and the quota required for the international army and navy.

With progressive disarmament and international peace safeguarded by world government dissatisfied nations now held captive by dominant nations for strategical purposes could be safely given their liberty.

Tenth. That the international army and navy should not be authorized to exercise military force further than to prevent or suppress the invasion of the territorial integrity of any of the member nations and in the blockade and embargo to enforce international law.

Eleventh. That it should be a violation of international law and the highest international crime for any nation on any alleged ground to invade the territorial limits of another nation. The penalty of such invasion should be immediate international blockade of the invading nation, embargo on all mail, express, and freight to or from such nation, and the suppression of such invasion by the international army and navy.

Twelfth. That nations backward in education, industrial and economic development, and in the knowledge of the principles of government should have their rights safeguarded on the principles of freedom, humanity, and justice by international agreement with a view to future self-government.

Thirteenth. It is clearly realized that the program of progressive disarmament or permanent world peace is impossible of attainment until the military forces now ruling the Teutonic people, first, either voluntarily acquiesce in progressive disarmament and international justice as the basis of world peace; second, are forced to do so by the Teutonic people; or, third, are coerced to do so by the combined powers of the world.

Fourteenth. That in order to bring this war to an early termination, the belligerent nations opposing the Teutonic powers should immediately cohere on a plan of international government pledging justice and peace to all member nations and the coercion of the military autocracy of Prussia by the commercial, financial, military, and naval forces of the world, giving assurance, nevertheless, to the Governments of Germany and Austria of their willingness to admit the Teutonic powers as members of the proposed international union on equal terms with other nations when they shall have met the conditions and given satisfactory guaranties.

Fifteenth. In our opinion no reliance should be placed upon the vague suggestions of peace of the Teutonic military autocracy, but that their obscure proposals should be regarded merely as a military ruse. The peace resolution of the Reichstag, while promising well for the attitude of the German people, when they achieve self-government, can not at present be regarded as a proposal binding on or capable of enforcement by the German people, because they do not control their own Government, but are mere subjects and puppets of a military autocracy which has long conspired and still dreams of conquering the world by military force and terrorism. The United States and the nations opposing militarism should strenuously prosecute the war with every available resource, and no separate peace should be made by any of them until the menace of the military autocracy of Germany is removed.

Sixteenth. It is our opinion that if a world-wide agreement can be established on the above principles, and the men now engaged in slaughter and destructive activities can be returned to productive industry, the world could quickly recover the gigantic shock of the present war and would be able without serious difficulty to soon repair the material injuries and losses already suffered.

Seventeenth. The United States does not enter this war for material advantage, for any selfish purpose, or to gratify either malice or ambition. The United States will not approve forcible annexations or mere punitive indemnities, but it will approve a free Poland, the restoration of territory wrongfully taken from France and Italy, and restorative indemnity to Belgium and Serbia and the adjustment of other differences by international conferences. It will favor extending international credits for the restoration of all places made waste by war. The United States enters this war in self-defense; to protect its own citizens and the nations of the world in their present and future rights to life and liberty on land and sea. It does not wish the world to remain an armed camp.

Eighteenth. No peace is desirable until the world can be safeguarded against a repetition of the present war. Competitive armaments must be ended and replaced by international cooperative armaments in order to assure permanent world peace.

Nineteenth. That the President of the United States shall immediately submit the above resolution to the belligerent nations now defending themselves against Prussian military autocracy and invite them and all neutral nations by wire to an international convention for the purpose of considering the above principles and taking affirmative action for the early suppression of the Teutonic military autocratic conspiracy by the combined commercial, financial, military, and naval powers of all nations.

Twentieth. The sum of $400,000 is hereby appropriated to meet the cost of promoting such convention.

WAR REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses and for other purposes.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I believe we all realize the importance of the situation which confronts the country. I think it is the belief of everyone that in this great emergency we shall need to utilize all the resources of the country. In such circumstances it is important that the burden shall rest upon him who can bear it best and to whom it will cause the least sacrifice. Thus far that principle seems to have actuated what has been done by the Congress at this session. The selective-draft law contemplates that those who can bear the burden best and most efficiently shall be chosen to perform one of the most important functions of the war. In the administration of that law there is no one but who believes favoritism should not be shown, that everyone of the same class should be treated precisely alike, and the fact that it is expected that that will be done is what has reconciled the country to the operation and administration of the law.

After providing for the raising of the men, designating those who shall bear arms for our country, perhaps the next most important function of Government will be to provide means whereby they may be supported upon the field of conflict. It is just as important that the means of supporting the Army shall provide that the burden shall rest upon him most able to bear it and to whom the sacrifice will be least, the same as we provided for the selection of the soldiers.

Your Committee on Finance for a number of weeks has been wrestling with this problem. The members of that committee have given thorough consideration to all these great questions, and the committee has endeavored to solve the problem upon the basis of the principles which I have announced. While the members of the committee have not been unanimous in reporting all the provisions of the bill, yet honest consideration has been given to each of those provisions.

In mere unimportant matters I feel called upon to support the action of the committee, although I may not be convinced that its action was entirely wise, because in these matters there must at least as to unimportant questions be compromises of judgment. But one important provision of the bill I could not agree to, and in the committee reserved the right to present it to the Senate. It seems to me of such vital importance that I would not be performing my duty as a member of this body did I not present it and let it rest upon the judgment of the body as a whole.

To my mind the bill makes a most radical departure from the principle of bearing the burden equally. It makes a departure which to my mind can not be defended upon this floor or before the people of the country who believe in equal and exact justice so far as it can be obtained.

One of the most important provisions in the bill—I think the most important—is that relating to the income tax. From net incomes, including the present law, it is proposed to raise not less than $1,137,000,000. The bill proposes to raise in addition to the income taxes provided by the present law over $777,000,000 from net incomes. The total amount proposed to be raised by the bill is but slightly in excess of $2,000,000,000. So the $777,000,000, the additional tax proposed to be raised by the bill, is the most important item in the bill.

How necessary, therefore, it is that this provision of the law shall rest equally upon the net incomes of the country! It is my purpose to show that under the existing law the burden does not rest equally upon the net incomes of the country, and that the bill as reported to the Senate not only magnifies but perpetuates what I believe to be a colossal injustice.

In construing a statute we are told that the first thing to ascertain is what the law was before the change was made, the reason for the change, the mischief which existed in the old law and which has been remedied. So now, while we are legislating upon this subject, it is important that we understand the existing law; that we understand how it operates; and if it operates unjustly, seek a remedy and enact the remedy into law.

This will necessitate a short review of the existing law and the manner in which it has operated. I shall be just as brief as possible in order that a clear understanding of the situation may be had.

The existing law necessarily deals with three classes of incomes: Those from individuals, those from partnerships, and those from corporations. In the beginning, I should like to state that I am sorry that it is necessary to make such a division; to have to treat individual income differently from corporate income. We know the prejudice in some sections of the country which exists against corporations. I wish to have it understood that I not only have no such prejudice, but I am sorry that the exigencies of the situation make it necessary to speak of these divisions of income. I wish it were possible for us to ferret out every dollar of net income in the country, whether of individuals or corporations, and to impose upon that dollar precisely the same tax as upon every other dollar.

I do not believe that in this time, when we are seeking to raise revenue upon such a stupendous scale and for such a purpose, there should be any discrimination where it is possible to eliminate the discrimination; but in the existing law corporations are dealt with separately from individuals and partnerships. I shall first direct your attention to the present statute. I shall refer first to the corporation income tax under the existing law.

We find that in the case of all corporations, joint-stock companies, associations, and insurance companies there is a tax of 2 per cent upon the net income. I wish to call attention also to what is meant by "net income." The statute is very carefully framed to define what net income is. It is carefully framed so that no corporation shall be taxed upon a single dollar which is not in truth and in fact a net addition to its capital.

First, from this tax there is exempt—

All the ordinary and necessary expenses paid within the year in the maintenance and operation of its business and property, including rentals or other payments required to be made as a condition to the continued use or possession of property to which the corporation has not taken or is not taking title or in which it has no equity.

Second. All losses actually sustained and charged off within the year and not compensated by insurance or otherwise, including a reasonable allowance for the exhaustion, wear, and tear of property arising out of its use or employment in the business or trade.

In the case of oil and gas wells a reasonable allowance is made for the reduction in the flow of the well and the quantity of oil obtained. In the case of mines a similar provision is made to charge off the net loss to the property.

Then, in regard to every kind of insurance company—life, fire, accident, and marine—careful provision is made to preserve the funds required for reserves and all of the dividends that are paid out to the policyholders. Only to the additional surplus, after caring for all of these provisions of insurance, does the normal tax attach to the funds of an insurance company.

Then, again, is exempted the amount of taxes which are paid any State, county, or municipal government. Again, there is an exemption of all the interest which the corporation may have paid upon its indebtedness. So, upon the whole, under the provisions of existing law there is no income subject to any tax until after all these contingencies are cared for. There is no tax upon any dollar which is not a net addition to the capital of the concern.

Under these circumstances it is difficult to conceive how you can injure vitally a corporation when you tax only its net income ascertained in this manner. It would be impossible, even if you took the whole of it, to injure the institution as such, because it would still have just as much property, just as much capital, as it had before it earned the additional money.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator of course appreciates the fact that the statute to which he has just referred was passed when the country was at peace with the world, and at a time when the revenues of the Government were being gathered under the historic and time-honored policy of levying duties upon imports. It served a very good purpose at that time, as the Senator of course knows. I do not know that it goes far enough for the present; but, nevertheless, some of us who were here and voted for that law felt that we had an abundance of revenue from another source much more satisfactory to us and much less burdensome to the people.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I am not criticizing the provisions of the present law in respect to the subject which I have just been discussing. On the other hand, the provisions which I have just been presenting are retained in the bill which has been reported to the Senate, and they were retained with my approval, because I believe that when you undertake to put a tax on net income it should be really on net income and that, even in this time of stress, it is not necessary to impose any further restriction upon what may be charged to the expense of carrying on the business. It is not my purpose, and I know it was not the purpose of the committee, to levy even these large taxes so as materially to interfere with the conduct of the business and the prosperity of the country. I am in sympathy with those provisions of the law and want them retained in this bill.

That is the only tax imposed under existing law upon corporate net incomes—a normal tax of 2 per cent.

When we come to the partnership we find that partnerships as such do not pay any income tax, but we find this provision:

Persons carrying on business in partnership shall be liable for income tax only in their individual capacity, and the share of the profits of the partnership to which any taxable partner would be entitled if the same were divided, whether divided or otherwise, shall be returned for taxation and the tax paid under the provisions of this title.

So, Mr. President, as to business carried on by a partnership, whether the net earnings are retained in the business or not, the individual partners must return their share of the net earnings and on them pay an income tax, adding the returns from the partnership to the income from other sources.

Upon individuals there is also levied a normal tax of 2 per cent. If the persons are married, there is an exemption of $4,000 and if unmarried an exemption of $3,000, the tax applying to all incomes above these respective amounts. Provision is made also for the deduction of ordinary expenses for carrying on an individual business, but if the individual retains his earnings in the business he accounts for those earnings, for that income, in making up his return for taxation, and the individual is not entitled to take out of his earnings from his business the personal living expenses of himself or family. If the individual only paid the same normal tax as the corporation, there could be no objection to it; but the law does not stop there.

The first law passed in 1913 provided for a surtax, ranging from 1 to 6 per cent, upon individual net incomes in excess of $20,000. That was modified last year by increasing the surtax from 1 per cent to 13 per cent. These surtaxes are paid by individuals, whether engaged in business in their individual name or through a partnership; but the net incomes of corporations pay no surtax under the existing law.

Mr. SIMMONS. Unless distributed.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Unless distributed. I might add—I intended to refer to it a little later, but upon the suggestion of the chairman of the committee I will refer to it now—that the existing law does provide that any net income of a corporation which has been earned subsequent to March 3, 1913, when distributed in dividends to stockholders must be mentioned in the return of the stockholder and he must pay the surtax upon them.

I will discuss the amount of the distribution of the earnings of corporations a little later on, so that we can arrive at knowledge as to how the existing law has operated.

The data regarding the operation of this law are most interesting, and I doubt if many Members of the Senate or many of the people throughout the country understand just how the present income-tax law has operated. It has been very difficult for me to obtain the information which I want to present to the Senate this morning. There is no division of the Government service whose business it is to ascertain the gross earnings and the net earnings of corporations, the amount of dividends which they pay, and the amount of their net income which is retained in the business; but I think I shall be able to present to the Senate information upon those subjects which will at least be accepted as showing approximately the actual conditions.

As I have stated, under the present law—the law of 1913 and the law of 1916—surtaxes were paid upon incomes in excess of $20,000. Only 37,679 people paid any such surtax, but the amount paid was $44,974,817.35. Under the proposed law the lowest amount upon which surtaxes are to be paid is reduced from $20,000 to $5,000; and if that had been the law in the fiscal year 1916 the number of persons paying such tax would have been increased to 208,658. The total number of corporations in the country making returns under the existing law is 335,000, and of that 335,000 only 190,911 returned anything as subject to the income tax, leaving 144,089 corporations making returns which showed themselves not subject to an income tax. The number of individuals in the country making income-tax returns—all of which, of course, showed themselves subject to an income tax—was 336,652; and of the earnings during the calendar year 1915 on which an income tax was paid in the fiscal year 1916 the aggregate net income of corporations for 1915 was $5,665,359,418. The aggregate net income of individuals for the same year was $2,399,365,798. The aggregate amount of net income of corporations in excess of the individual incomes was $3,265,003,629.

In the calendar year 1916, fiscal year 1917, the incomes of corporations amounted to $9,000,000,000, the incomes of individuals to $3,000,000,000. Corporations paid a normal tax of 2 per cent; individuals paid a normal tax of 2 per cent; and the individuals during the last year paid the surtax graduated from 1 per cent to 13 per cent on incomes over $20,000. Prior to this last year the normal tax was only 1 per cent. That was all that corporations paid. Under the law the first year the individual surtax was graduated from 1 to 6 per cent only, but here is what was paid:

In the fiscal year 1915 corporations paid $39,144,531.71, individuals $41,046,162.09. In 1916 corporations paid $56,972,720.88, individuals $67,953,594.63. For last year, when the normal tax was increased to 2 per cent upon corporations as well as upon individuals, and when the surtax was raised from 1 per cent to 13 per cent, we find that each paid substantially, $180,000,000—almost the same—the net incomes of individuals being $3,000,000,000 and that of corporations $9,000,000,000.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARDING. I want to ask the Senator if he would have the Senate infer that some 60 per cent of corporate net incomes was retained as a surplus in the hands of the corporations or whether that difference lies in the small dividends that are not returned for the surtax?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I expect to reach just that point a little later.

Mr. HARDING. Very well.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I wish to have it understood now that this is upon the total net incomes of corporations before dividends are paid.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CALDER. Has the Senator from New Mexico the income-tax figures and the corporation-tax figures by States?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have not. I will state to the Senator that I reached that figure from the amount of taxes paid by all corporations, as reported by the Secretary of the Treasury, and then ascertained the amount by applying the income tax which they had paid. The income tax paid by corporations is something over $180,000,000 and the tax was 2 per cent. Therefore they must have paid on a little over $9,000,000,000.

Mr. CALDER. I was anxious to have the Senator include the figures by States, if he had them.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have not them for that year. The only year for which I have obtained those figures is the fiscal year 1916, showing the tax collected upon incomes of 1915. That can be found in the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to ask the Senator if, in his comparison between the incomes of corporations and the incomes of individuals, he has taken into account the fact that the corporation has no exemption, while every individual has an exemption of $5,000 under the present law?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The exemption under the present law is not just what the Senator has stated. It is only $4,000 in the case of married persons and $3,000 in the case of unmarried persons.

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, that is true. I should have stated the exemptions as $4,000 and $3,000, respectively. I had reference to the present law.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The corporation has no exemption.

Mr. SIMMONS. The point I wish to call the attention of the Senator to, however, is that if that is left out, of course that $4,000 or $3,000, as the case may be, exemption allowed to individuals cuts a very big figure in the aggregate of incomes of individuals.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It does, of course, cut a very great figure when it is applied to all of the individuals of the country; but the number of people making a return for the purposes of an income tax in the entire country is only 336,000, and if you were to exempt each one to the extent of $4,000 you would not have such a very stupendous sum.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GERRY in the chair). Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. KING. Has the Senator any information that would indicate the number of individuals who pay income taxes who derive their incomes from other sources than profits of corporations? In other words, is it not a fact that nearly all who pay an income tax as individuals pay it out of profits that they have derived from corporations?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I, of course, know from general observation that what the Senator has stated is largely true; but as to the exact extent of it I do not know, and I do not know that such information has ever been collected.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does not the Senator think it would be more fair, or at least give a fairer understanding of the situation, to take into consideration the fact that the corporation is simply an instrumentality through which the individual earns income, and the stockholder in the corporation in reality pays whatever the corporation pays, and then in addition he must pay an income tax out of his dividends? It does not seem to me that we should treat the corporation as a separate individual, because it is but an institution the stock of which is owned by the individual, and every dollar paid by the corporation is an additional dollar paid by the individual, over and above what he pays as his income tax.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the Senator has made a statement which is often adverted to, and which is made by corporations themselves whenever such a position meets their view of the particular question to be considered; but it is often the case that the corporations themselves insist that they are artificial persons, distinct entities, created by law, and therefore entitled to the privileges of the individual. As I will show later, it is impossible for the purpose of meeting this situation so to treat the corporations. The Senator, who is also a member of the Finance Committee, knows that I, perhaps above all others, sought to enforce the very equitable principle which he has just stated, and that it was abandoned solely because the law of the case is such that you can not use that principle in imposing an income tax upon the undistributed earnings of corporations.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. Do I understand the Senator to advocate an increase of the normal tax upon corporations?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do not.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not think the Senator did, because if it were increased it would tax a part of the dividends earned by the corporations that would go to stockholders that under the law would not be compelled to pay any income tax whatever, and it seemed to me that to increase the normal tax upon corporations would be unjust to such stockholders, although increasing the normal tax upon corporations, of course, would show a great deal larger tax paid by corporations. I was wondering if the Senator's argument, showing how small an amount the normal tax brought from corporations, was for the purpose of suggesting that that normal tax ought to be increased. I am very glad to hear the Senator say, however, that he does not think it ought to be increased.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will make a statement later on in reference to the provision in the bill as presented by the committee which does increase the normal tax on corporations.

Mr. SMOOT. Four per cent.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARDING. The Senator agrees, does he not, that the Treasury Department takes into account the surplus of the corporation and assesses the capital stock?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It does.

Mr. HARDING. The Senator is also aware that various State governments, most of them at least, levy an excess tax on corporations?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I think some of them do, but not all.

Mr. HARDING. And the Senator also admits that excess earnings are taxed universally on the corporations?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. They are to be so taxed.

Mr. HARDING. I am at a loss to understand, then, how they are escaping the tax we are seeking to place upon everybody who is earning excess profits.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am not asserting that any of these are escaping any tax which has thus far been imposed upon them, but I am undertaking to show that the present law does not reach the incomes of corporations in the same way or to the same extent that it does reach the incomes of individuals.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. You mean the present bill?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The present law.

Mr. HARDING. The proposed law meets it, does it not?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I think not, as I shall undertake to show later.

Mr. HARDING. I shall be very much interested in the Senator's statement.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I have prepared a table which shows the number of persons who would pay surtaxes under the proposed law within the various brackets if the proposed law had applied to the persons making income-tax return for the fiscal year 1916. I have also here a table showing the surtaxes paid by individuals for the fiscal year 1916 and the amount of surtax which was collected upon the various brackets or graduated sums. I ask leave to insert these tables in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The first table referred to is as follows:

Table showing number of persons who are expected to pay surtaxes within the various brackets of the proposed bill.

	Persons.
$5,000 to $10,000 income	120,402
$10,000 to $15,000 income	34,102
$15,000 to $20,000 income	16,475
$20,000 to $25,000 income	9,707
$25,000 to $30,000 income	6,196
$30,000 to $40,000 income	7,005
$40,000 to $50,000 income	4,100
$50,000 to $75,000 income	4,791
$75,000 to $100,000 income	2,066
$100,000 to $150,000 income	1,793
$150,000 to $200,000 income	724
$200,000 to $250,000 income	386
$250,000 to $300,000 income	216
$300,000 to $400,000 income	254
$400,000 to $500,000 income	122
$500,000 to $1,000,000 income	209
$1,000,000 and over	120
Total	208,658

The second table referred to is as follows:

Table showing amount of income taxes paid for the fiscal year 1916 within the various brackets of the applicable law.

Individual income tax:
Normal, 1 per cent	$23,995,777.28
$20,001 to $50,000, 1 per cent	6,091,775.71
$50,001 to $75,000, 2 per cent	4,071,361.94
$75,001 to $100,000, 3 per cent	3,623,472.62
$100,001 to $250,000, 4 per cent	10,936,326.15
$250,001 to $500,000, 5 per cent	6,393,858.64
Exceeding $500,000, 6 per cent	12,647,862.91

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The result is that under the bill as now presented to the Senate it is estimated that the normal income tax of individuals will raise $89,000,000 of revenue in addition to the revenue which will be raised under the existing law. The present bill provides only for revenue in addition to the existing law. The bill provides also for the raising from surtaxes of individuals $330,000,000, making a total amount to be raised from individuals under the bill $419,000,000, and it is expected to raise under the existing law $180,000,000 in addition, making the total income expected to be obtained from individual incomes under the bill and the existing law $600,000,000—to be exact, $599,763,450. The additional tax expected to be derived from the various brackets in the bill are estimated in a table, which I will ask leave to print in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

Additional surtaxes levied under this bill estimated to yield as follows:

$5,000 to $7,500, at 1 per cent	$4,368,440
$7,500 to $10,000, at 2 per cent	5,683,440
$10,000 to $12,500, at 3 per cent	5,987,420
$12,500 to $15,000, at 4 per cent	6,253,170
$15,000 to $20,000, at 6 per cent	13,944,740
$20,000 to $40,000, at 8 per cent	34,352,640
$40,000 to $60,000, at 10 per cent	20,334,300
$60,000 to $80,000, at 12 per cent	15,205,680
$80,000 to $100,000, at 16 per cent	15,896,290
$100,000 to $150,000, at 20 per cent	28,856,100
$150,000 to $200,000, at 23 per cent	$18,404,710
$200,000 to $250,000, at 26 per cent	14,152,320
$250,000 to $300,000, at 29 per cent	12,049,970
$300,000 to $500,000, at 31 per cent	28,761,180
$500,000 and over, at 33 per cent	106,379,450
Total	330,628,950
Estimated surtaxes under present law	120,000,000
Total individual surtaxes, fiscal year 1918	450,628,000

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Under the existing law and this bill there is expected to be raised from surtaxes, not the normal tax included but from surtaxes alone upon individual net incomes, $450,000,000.

In this bill it is proposed to reduce the exemption from the income tax as to married persons from $4,000 to $2,000 and as to unmarried persons from $3,000 to $1,000. The effect of that reduction is to add to the amount of the net income of individuals just about 50 per cent. So for the present year the total net income of individuals with the exemptions thus reduced is expected to be approximately four and a half billion dollars—$4,456,725,000.

The corporate incomes are estimated for this year, as I have already stated, at $9,000,000,000; but that is the amount of corporate incomes for last year. No estimate is made for increased incomes during the year 1917, but if we allow anything like the increase in the corporate incomes for this year that has actually appeared for the last one or two years—if we have anything like the same ratio of increase on corporate incomes for this year, the corporate incomes for this year will be far in excess of $10,000,000,000. But upon the basis of $9,000,000,000 for corporations and $4,500,000,000 for individuals, under the bill it is expected that from a 4 per cent normal tax the amount realized from individual incomes, including the surtaxes, will be $600,000,000, and that realized from corporations only $360,000,000, making a difference that the individuals will pay upon one-half the incomes that the corporations have, $240,000,000 more than the corporations will pay. If the normal tax upon corporations is increased to 6 per cent as proposed in the bill, that will add an additional $180,000,000 to corporate revenue, but even putting it at 6 per cent, as proposed in the bill, and the surtaxes upon individuals as proposed in the bill, we still have individuals with four and a half billion dollars of income paying $60,000,000 more taxes than corporations with over $9,000,000,000 of income.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not want to interrupt the Senator or to harass him at this time, but I should like to ask him whether he has taken into consideration the local taxes paid by these corporations? He has mentioned insurance companies, and I presume he also includes many of the manufacturing corporations which pay a franchise tax. Has the Senator taken into consideration the local taxes paid to the State by these corporations? In the matter of fire insurance they amount practically to 5 per cent, and life insurance, I think, nearly as much. These corporations, before the dividends are paid by them to their stockholders, are paying locally to the State, and as far as fire insurance companies are concerned they are paying to every State practically 5 per cent tax on their incomes. That is what the corporations are now paying locally in the States which individuals do not pay.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator is probably right as to his own State and to some other States, but in New Mexico the corporation law does not so provide.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. May I correct the statement as far as New Mexico is concerned in relation to fire insurance companies? New Mexico, I understand, has a local tax of 2 per cent and a license tax on the premium income of fire insurance companies and life insurance companies.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That is true as to fire insurance companies, and that tax is used by the volunteer fire companies of the State so as to aid the insurance companies in reducing the amount of their damage in the event of fire.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. As I understand it, that tax has no relation whatever to the volunteer fire tax. It is a tax imposed by the State and is used by the State for its own expenses. The volunteer fire tax is an additional tax. Practically the companies are paying 5 per cent in New Mexico, I believe.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I, of course, am willing to accept the Senator's statement always. I was speaking merely from recollection. But assuming that to be true, to my mind it does not change the situation in the slightest. We all know that there are advantages in corporate organizations, and if it were not for those advantages I imagine that the business such as that to which the Senator has referred would not be conducted under those circumstances.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARDING. Does the Senator think the business would be conducted at all? Does he not think it would not be possible to do it?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I think that is quite aside from the point which we are discussing. It is difficult for us to speculate as to what might happen or what might not happen.

Mr. HARDING. If the Senator will allow me, I think it is very pertinent to the discussion, because you can follow a policy in levying a burden to such an extent that you very much hamper progress.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If the Senator will permit me, I think these corporations feel that they are getting a dollar's worth of benefit for every dollar which they pay for any such purpose, and if they did not feel that they were reaping a benefit commensurate with the amount of the tax they would not engage in the business. Besides, all these expenses are taken into consideration when they fix the amount of the premiums which they charge. This is no justification for exemption from any other just tax.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Can the Senator tell us whether the apparent discrepancy disappears and to what extent after the dividends of corporations have been distributed?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I purpose to show that a little later, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CALDER. I have been very much impressed with the Senator's interesting statement. Does he propose to deal with the matter of an excess-profits tax in its relations to net corporations profits?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Not at all. I did not intend to allude to that in this statement.

Mr. CALDER. Will not the matter of an excess-profits tax levied against corporations and against individuals affect materially this whole matter of net profits that are subject to taxation?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I take it the amount of money which will be paid as tax upon excess profits will reduce some of the net incomes of corporations, and of course that will have to be accounted for in the estimate which we make; but I will state to the Senator that the Senate committee has imposed a war-profits tax upon individuals engaged in business precisely the same as corporations.

Mr. CALDER. I so understand.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Now, Mr. President, I desire to refer to the suggestion which was made some little time ago by the chairman of the Finance Committee as to the provisions of law regarding the tax upon these earnings by the stockholders when distributed. The law does provide that when distributed the stockholder shall account for the amount received and add it to his other earnings for the purpose of the income tax, provided it were earned by the corporation subsequent to March 3, 1913. There is another provision of the law which was intended to prevent corporations from hoarding their earnings for the purpose of avoiding the payment of the surtax by the individual stockholders were the earnings distributed. But the law as it exists has proven a dead letter. It has not been invoked in a single case, so far as my information goes from the officials of the Treasury Department, and the amount of money retained as surplus by corporations and subsequently distributed is an infinitesimal amount. It is true that occasionally we hear something about the cutting of a melon by these corporations; but with this high war tax, if the individual stockholders who would receive these enormous accumulations in dividends should have to pay the high surtax, my prediction is that the crop of melons will grow even less; this war will be worse than a drought and there will be no harvest.

Mr. President, as to the extent to which these corporations retain their net income after the payment of dividends, as I have stated, there is no official information, and I have been compelled to resort to various sources for the purpose of reaching some conclusion as to the extent of the net incomes of corporations which have paid a normal tax, which are undistributed to stockholders, which are retained by the corporation, and on which no surtax is imposed either by the present law or under the bill as it comes from the Senate committee.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. It is the understanding of the Senator that the dividends earned by corporations and paid out to the stockholders are not assessed either under the income tax or under the corporation tax.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Under the present law and the law imposed in this bill corporations pay a normal tax upon their total net incomes. The individual stockholders account for what they receive by way of dividends in making up their returns, and where necessary pay a surtax upon the distributed earnings of the corporation received by way of dividends by the stockholders. But the amount of net income which the corporation retains in its treasury, after the payment of dividends, pays no surtax and no surtax is imposed by this bill.

Mr. GRONNA. I think it is generally understood in my section of the country. I think it is the practice and I think I can show that there is a tax paid by corporations upon all the dividends distributed to stockholders.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. There is a normal tax paid, if the Senator will permit me, and only the normal tax. That normal tax is paid by the corporation, and when the individual accounts for dividends received from a corporation which has paid the normal tax the individual takes credit for the normal tax which has been paid by the corporation.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Otherwise it would be double taxation.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. I want to suggest to the Senator—it is not probably quite germane to the theme now being discussed, but it is germane to the question of ascertaining the profits of corporations for distribution—that I notice in the bill and it is also the existing law, that corporations are permitted for the purpose of ascertaining their profits to deduct interest charges. I can not see the reason why such deduction is allowed. I should be very glad to learn from the Senator what defense there is for that provision.

To illustrate—so that I may make the case clear, if I have not done so—suppose the Senator from New Mexico and myself organize a corporation, and we put in $1,000,000; the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from North Carolina organize a corporation, and they put in $500,000 and then issue bonds for a like amount; and these corporations then engage in the same class of business. In the latter instance the Senator from North Carolina and the Senator from Michigan would be permitted to deduct the interest which they paid upon their bonds in determining what the profits were, whereas in the corporation formed by the Senator from New Mexico and myself, in the supposititious case, we would not be permitted to have any deductions, because we have paid in full the capital stock. It seems to me that that is manifestly unjust. If a corporation borrows money, it is merely an augmentation of its capital stock and it ought not to be permitted to have deductions for interest charges in determining what its profits are.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah raises a most interesting question and one which will be discussed in connection with another provision of the bill. He will doubtless find that there is a divergence of view regarding the matter which he has suggested and very forceful argument can be presented along the line the Senator has suggested, and doubtless will be by himself when that question is reached.

Mr. KING. I am not a member of the committee, and so I do not expect to participate in the argument.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I was seeking to present the sources of information from which I have obtained the amount of the undistributed net income of corporations after the payment of dividends. You have all been noticing in the newspapers statements about this corporation and the other corporation as to the amount of its net income and net earnings and the amount of dividends declared and the amount retained. Those newspaper articles do give us a little ray of light; they furnish splendid information so far as they go; but unfortunately there is nobody whose business it is to compile such information. I have statements here coming from different parts of the country as to the earnings of some of the copper companies; the amount of money which they have earned and the amounts which they have paid out in dividends and the amount which is being retained. It is interesting to notice this, just as a straw indicates the direction of the wind. I find a newspaper dispatch from New York, dated July 24 of this year, which reads:

Forty-three strictly copper companies paid $87,897,530 in cash dividends in the first six months of 1917, bringing their total dividends up to $932,608,689. * * *

Against dividends of $87,897,530, paid by the 43 copper companies, their operating profits for six months past exceeded $161,500,000. This is after deducting income tax, and, in most cases, depreciation, but not excess-profits tax. The dividends paid amount, therefore, to scarcely over half the profits earned.

I might read on a little further. Then I have a newspaper clipping here with regard to the earnings of the Utah Copper Co. and the Phelps-Dodge Co. for the past six months. The Utah Copper Co. is referred to in a clipping dated Salt Lake, August 10.

Net earnings of the Utah Copper Co. for the quarter ending June 30 are quoted at $10,563,541 in the thirty-seventh quarterly report of the company issued to-day. The production for the period is quoted at 56,845,059 pounds. Both production and net earnings were said to be the largest in the company's history. The report shows payment to stockholders for the quarter of $5,685,715, leaving a net surplus for the period covered by the report of $4,877,826.

Almost 50 per cent for a copper company.

During the time the committee was considering this bill various representatives of the interests throughout the country appeared before the committee and interviewed various members of the committee, and among others were some representatives of the American Manufacturers' Association. They filed a brief with the committee. In the brief or attached to it is the financial statement of 10 mining companies, 10 public utilities, 10 railroads, and 10 manufacturing concerns. They undertake to present to us their net earnings during the last six years, with the amount of dividends paid and the amount of surplus retained. According to their own figures, in the way in which they have figured, the amount of net income retained undistributed on the average with these four classes is 37 per cent of the whole.

Mr. GORE. Was that for last year?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That is the average for six years.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator ought to tell us, if he has the information, how these 10 companies were selected, in order that we may be sure that no unfair methods were employed in their selection.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I am not able to enlighten the Senator in that respect, but I think we have the right to assume that the manufacturers who presented this brief selected such companies as they thought would exemplify their contention.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it fair to assume that, unless they disclose the rule by which the companies were selected, they selected those most favorable to their contention.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I quite agree with the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. To have any weight the companies ought to be selected under some form, according to some method or rule by which they would fairly illustrate the condition not only of these 10 companies but of all other companies.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I desire to state, Mr. President, that I have examined these tables, and I find in the list several corporations which during these years are reported as having paid dividends out of previous earnings, and that such payments out of previous earnings have been charged against current earnings, thus reducing the amount of the corporate earnings retained and undistributed. When I found out that that was the case, I thought the whole table should be discarded. However, I took the figures presented by these tables as to these four classes of corporations for the year 1916; I added up their net earnings for that year and subtracted the dividends paid in that year, and the amount of the earnings of those corporations undistributed for that year was 49.6 per cent.

Mr. President, during the course of our hearings a most excellent lawyer and a most admirable gentleman from New York called upon me for the purpose of discussing some of the features of this bill. He was interested in showing that corporations under contract or by their charters had obligated themselves to retain certain percentages of their net income in the business, and his argument was that, therefore, the corporation ought not to pay any tax upon the amount so retained. He furnished me a table of 24 miscellaneous companies represented by his office. The table was made up for the purpose of furnishing information upon the question which I have just stated, but I thought it advisable to use the table in this other connection. So I have ascertained the total amount of net income of these 24 corporations and the amount of dividends which they have paid, and I find that the per cent of the net income retained by these 24 corporations was 68.7 per cent plus for the calendar year 1915.

Among these 24 corporations are listed Sears, Roebuck & Co., F. W. Woolworth Co., Jewell Tea Co. (Inc.), National Cloak & Suit Co., Maxwell Motor Co., and the Manhattan Shirt Co. I mention these to show the miscellaneous character of the 24 corporations whose statements are presented in this pamphlet.

The industrious Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] presented to the Senate with the views of the minority filed by him the names of 95 corporations with the various amounts of their earnings for a number of years, and with the amount of their earnings for 1916. I have taken the trouble to make an estimate as to the 95 corporations, and that investigation shows that of the earnings of those 95 corporations 65.79 per cent of the net income has been retained.

I will state that the table presented by the Senator from Wisconsin as to railroads is inaccurate in this respect: It was made up, as I ascertained from investigation, by referring to what was called in the Railroad Analytical Digest undistributed earnings. In the case of the Southern Pacific Railroad, while that concern paid out in dividends over $16,000,000 and had a net income of over $21,000,000, the dividends were paid out of a preexisting surplus, and the $21,000,000 retained as net income. That was not so bad; but in the case of the Santa Fe Railroad, after the Santa Fe Railroad had paid its dividends, it had about $18,000,000 of undivided surplus earnings; it appropriated on its books $7,000,000 for betterments and extensions, and left only $6,000,000 appearing as the net income retained. I have not used that table so far as it affects the railroads because of this inaccuracy in the source of information.

Mr. President, I have here a list of railroads doing 90 per cent of the transportation business of the country—a table compiled from the reports made by these railroads to the Interstate Commerce Commission. This table shows that the total dividends of all these railroads, doing 90 per cent of the whole transportation business of the country, were $289,310,357. The total net income undistributed was $337,321,865. The amount of net income undistributed was 53.84 per cent, and the amount distributed 46.16 per cent.

Mr. President, I ask leave to have this table printed as an appendix to my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENDRICK in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I have here a statement regarding the banks of the country.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves the subject to which he has just been addressing himself, will he permit an interruption?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. Has the Senator any figures to indicate what the railroads did with that apparently large percentage of their profits not distributed as dividends? I ask because the information that has been furnished the Senate from time to time indicates that many of the railroads require money for repairs and for betterments, and notwithstanding the reservations of profits which doubtless have gone into betterments, repairs, and new equipment, there is still an inadequate amount of money for that purpose, and they are asking the Interstate Commerce Commission for authority to increase their rates. Obviously, that which they have retained must have been used for some purpose. It certainly can not be in the treasuries of the companies.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, as I have tried to state, before you call any earnings "net income" you deduct all the costs of repairs and maintenance and depreciation; and if they retain any net income after such deduction it is an addition to capital and is used, of course, either in extensions or in betterments—that is, in adding to the physical properties of the companies. As I shall undertake to show a little later, that money thus used should not escape the income tax or this surtax any more than the income of the individual which is kept in his business.

Mr. President, I do not know the extent of the yearly accumulations of undistributed incomes of the national banks, but I find this statement recently published in the city of New York as to the New York banks. It shows that the New York national banks have capital stocks of $122,825,000 and surpluses and undivided profits of $214,074,200; that the trust companies have capital stocks of $89,500,000 and surpluses and undivided profits of $178,822,000; that the State banks have capitals of $24,050,000 and surpluses and undivided profits of $41,732,300, making a total for the city of New York of all these banks—national, trust, and State—in the way of capital of $236,425,000 and of surplus and undivided profits $434,628,500.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CALDER. The Senator, I am sure, is of the opinion that this is a very healthy state of affairs.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I quite agree with the Senator.

Mr. CALDER. And he would not discourage the practice of accumulating large surpluses on the part of banks.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Not at all. I mentioned these figures to show the strength of the banks of the city of New York with respect to the amount of capital and the accumulated surplus and undivided profits; but the purpose of my so showing is to demonstrate that these banks do retain in their business a considerable percentage, the amount of which I do not know, of their net incomes, which is not distributed to the stockholders, and therefore, under the existing law or the bill now presented to the Senate, is not subject to any surtax.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. CALDER. I will say to the Senator that some of these banks have been over 100 years in building up these great, magnificent surpluses which have made them so strong and powerful and so important to the country in time of stress.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am not criticizing what has been done, if the Senator will permit me. I recall quite well the fact that some years ago, in the case of the Chemical National Bank of New York, $100 shares of stock were selling for over $4,000.

Mr. CALDER. The surplus of that bank is more than ten times its capital.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand the Senator, he is not criticizing that, but he is criticizing the proposed law on the ground that it does not reach some of that surplus, which under this system escapes taxation.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. My point is that under the existing law and the proposed law, if an individual should do precisely the same thing, he would have to pay a surtax upon his income, while the corporation escapes. I am not trying to impose any undue burden upon the corporation, but I am simply seeking to put the corporation upon an equal footing with the individuals of the country.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think the Senator is a bit unfair in his comparison. The individual is not dependent upon his credit for the transaction of any business, whereas the corporation is dependent upon its credit for the transaction of the business which it conducts. It is the surplus of the company which is always looked at as far as credit is concerned. A bank requires a surplus for the expansion of its credit; an insurance company has to have a surplus to meet the lean years, to meet the catastrophies that come to insurance companies—the San Francisco fire, for instance, the Baltimore fire, the San Francisco fire taking $240,000,000 from the insurance corporations, a great plague, an accident hitting the accident insurance companies. Those are the things which make it absolutely necessary, as far as a corporation is concerned, that it build up a surplus. The same is true of a bank. When hard times come, times of necessity, when a panic is impending, it is necessary that they shall have their surpluses. An individual does not have to meet those contingencies; and therefore I think the comparison is somewhat unfair.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I must hurry on. I have occupied the floor much longer than I intended, but I want to say this to the Senator: I do not controvert the argument which he has just made, but I do want to assert that if the corporation does that thing, if it uses net income which in the hands of an individual would have to pay a surtax, there is no earthly reason why that money should escape this Federal tax any more than any other Federal tax. The argument which the Senator makes is an argument against all taxation upon incomes of such corporations.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Not at all, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GERRY in the chair). Does the Senator from New Mexico further yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I claim that, rather than tax the surplus, direct taxation should be imposed by the Federal Government; if it is 2 per cent or 3 per cent that it should be imposed in that way rather than as a tax upon the surplus that a company accumulates.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That proposition I expect to discuss a little later in my remarks.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am not against all taxation. I believe the corporations should pay their just share of the taxes.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then I am quite sure the Senator will vote for the amendment which I propose to offer to this bill.

Mr. President, I find from the figures taken from the manufacturers' briefs that the percentage of net income retained was 49.6 per cent. The percentage in the case of the 24 miscellaneous companies referred to in the other document was 68.7 per cent. The percentage in the case of the 95 industrial companies mentioned in the minority report of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] was 65.79 per cent. In the case of the railroads doing 90 per cent of the business of the whole country the percentage was 53.84 per cent. It seems to me that, taking all of that information together, we ought to arrive at pretty nearly the correct result. These thousands of corporations in this country which are not paying any dividends at all, which were organized with watered stock, and are retaining their earnings from year to year with the hope of putting some substance into the shells which they created, are earning net incomes. All these listed concerns are the dividend-paying concerns. When these various factors are considered I think we are safe in coming to the conclusion that the practice of these concerns is a fair one to apply in making an estimate for the country. The average percentage thus obtained is 59.48 per cent, but let us give them the benefit of the doubt. With this evidence which has been accumulated, have you any doubt that the corporations of this country are retaining undistributed, free from any surtax, 50 per cent? I will not call it 59.6 per cent, but 50 per cent. Is not that a safe basis from which to make our calculations? With 50 per cent of their net incomes escaping surtax, if you make the total income only $9,000,000,000—and it was that last year—you have four and a half billion dollars, more than the total incomes of all the individual taxpayers of the country, an income which in the hands of the taxpayers of the country would pay $450,000,000 of a surtax, going absolutely scot free under the present law of the country and under the proposed law.

I might have added also, Mr. President, that the extreme cases were not mentioned in the various tables to which I have referred.

No mention was made there of the Bessemer & Lake Erie Railroad, which last year earned 795 per cent and paid only 150 per cent in dividends.

No mention is made of the Aluminum Co. of America, which does not make any financial report to the commercial concerns of the country, but which is paying 16 per cent dividends. In 1904 it paid 100 per cent stock dividends; in 1909 another dividend of 500 per cent in stock.

The Ford Motor Co. is not mentioned, a concern which was organized in 1903 with $2,000,000 capital stock and no bonds. It has the same $2,000,000 of capital stock to-day and no bonds. In 1912 its total assets were over $20,000,000; in 1916 over $132,000,000. Last year its net revenue was practically $60,000,000. It paid dividends of 60 per cent; but the 60 per cent was only $1,200,000, leaving a net surplus retained in the treasury of $58,794,118 for last year.

These extreme cases are not mentioned among the corporations from which estimates have been made.

No mention is made of the Ford Motor Co. of Canada, which in a few years has declared stock dividends to the extent of 1,300 per cent.

Under all these circumstances are we not justified in saying that the amount retained by these corporations is at least 50 per cent?

Now, as to the amount of these earnings at different times briefly stated——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, and I have not done so before, but I have interrupted him at this time for the purpose of asking further his view. I understand the Senator to say that he estimates under the present law at least 50 per cent of the earnings of the corporations are undistributed. Am I correct in that?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator is quite correct.

Mr. SIMMONS. Under the present law, of course, there is no provision requiring them to make any distribution whatever of their earnings. That is to say, if they fail to make a distribution at all, there is no punishment, there is no tax imposed, there is no power or authority to control their discretion in that regard. That is true, I believe. The Senator will probably not deny that.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That is quite true.

Mr. SIMMONS. Under the amendments made by the committee that situation is radically changed. Under these amendments, if they retain in their business an amount of their annual earnings in excess of what are the reasonable requirements of the business, to be ascertained and determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, then they are required to pay a tax of 10 per cent, and that tax may be under certain circumstances increased to 15 per cent by way of a penalty. That is to say, if they retain an amount which the Secretary of the Treasury shall find is reasonably required in that business, they pay a tax of 10 per cent; but if they retain a greater amount than he finds is reasonably necessary in their business, by way of penalty, that tax is raised to 15 per cent. In the present condition they can retain it without any tax, but under this amendment if they retain more than is reasonably necessary in their business they will have to pay a tax of either 10 or 15 per cent.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I had intended a little later to discuss the proposal of the committee, and I expect to demonstrate even to the satisfaction of the chairman of the committee that the proposal of the committee will be absolutely inoperative and effect no useful purpose.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me right in this connection, by way of compensation to the Government for any amount, whether necessary or unnecessary, in the conduct of the business the committee have for the first time made a differentiation between the normal tax of the individual and the normal tax of the corporation. As it now stands in the corporation income-tax law, and as it has stood from the beginning, the normal tax of the individual and the normal tax, so to speak, of the corporation have been identically the same. In the House bill they are the same, but in the Senate committee bill we have raised the rate upon corporations from 4 per cent, the rate which is applied to an individual's normal income, to 6 per cent, thereby increasing the corporate tax 2 per cent above what it has heretofore been and above what it is in the bill as passed by the House and above what the normal tax of the individual is. We did that chiefly for the purpose of equalizing any possible difference which might exist between the individual and the corporation with reference to surtaxes.

Now, by reason of that increase of 2 per cent we will get from the corporations of this country, upon the basis of the returns of 1916, $180,000,000. I believe that under the restrictions that we have imposed in the bill with reference to the amount that may be retained with the penalty that we have placed upon the retention of more than the necessary amount as found by the Secretary of the Treasury the $180,000,000 will very much more than equal the entire surtax if the whole amount had been distributed.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I expect to discuss that question a little later. I believe that while the Senator has stated what the bill provides with respect to this addition to the normal tax of corporations is true, I think I shall be able to show that it is unfair and contrary to all the other equitable provisions of the bill which are exemplified in the graduated income tax and the graduated war-profits tax.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I hope I will not impose upon the Senator unduly, and I would not ask to be recognized at this time if it were not for the purpose of correcting the statement inadvertently made by the chairman of the committee. He stated that there was no law to-day by which a tax can be imposed upon distributed profits. I wish to call attention to the act of September 8, 1916, under title 1, section 3. I ask Senators to follow this language:

For the purpose of the additional tax—

That is, speaking of the additional normal tax—

For the purpose of the additional tax, the taxable income of any individual shall include the share to which he would be entitled of the gains and profits, if divided or distributed, whether divided or distributed or not, of all corporations, joint-stock companies or associations, or insurance companies, however created or organized, formed or fraudulently availed of for the purpose of preventing the imposition of such tax through the medium of permitting such gains and profits to accumulate instead of being divided or distributed; and the fact that any such corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company, is a mere holding company, or that the gains and profits are permitted to accumulate beyond the reasonable needs of the business, shall be prima facie evidence of a fraudulent purpose to escape such tax; but the fact that the gains and profits are in any case permitted to accumulate and become surplus shall not be construed as evidence of a purpose to escape the said tax in such case unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall certify that in his opinion such accumulation is unreasonable for the purposes of the business. When requested by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, or any district collector of internal revenue, such corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company shall forward to him a correct statement of such gains and profits and the names and addresses of the individuals or shareholders who would be entitled to the same if divided or distributed.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand that while I was out the Senator from Utah stated that I had inadvertently overlooked the act of September 8, 1916.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I did not inadvertently overlook that act; I did not refer to it, because I think it is generally understood that by reason of the terms of that provision it was not really enforced and it became a dead letter upon the statute books. I think the committee recognized that it was a dead letter upon the statute books, and they therefore substituted a provision which would be effective in accomplishing the purpose that that section had in view. The law was so drafted that it accomplished no purpose at all, and I understand that only two cases were brought up under it.

Mr. SMOOT. The original act, I will say to the Senator, had a provision similar to that, but no action was taken under the act of September 8, 1916. I am informed there are certain cases now under investigation by the department as to imposing the tax under section 3 of the act of September 8, 1916.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the committee regarded it as inoperative for practical purposes and that it had not accomplished the purpose which its authors probably had in mind.

I do not know whether before I sat down I asked the Senator from New Mexico the question which I really intended in my interruption to ask him. The question which I wanted to ask him was whether, in his opinion, the changes that the committee has made investing the Secretary of the Treasury with the power of ascertaining and determining whether the amount retained by the corporation was excessive or not to meet any reasonable requirement upon its business and imposing a tax of 10 per cent or 15 per cent as the case might be, would not tend to bring about a much larger distribution of corporate assets than under present conditions, and if in his opinion with this change in the law there would be anything like 50 per cent of the earnings of the corporation under this act undistributed?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I expect to discuss the provisions of the bill as reported by the Senate committee a little later. I do not believe, if the Senator will excuse me, that I would like to discuss that now, but I propose a little later to show that the result which the Senator has just announced himself to expect will not be realized. The provision of the existing law referred to by the Senator from Utah was referred to by me earlier in my remarks, and I think I stated then substantially what the chairman of the committee has just stated regarding that law.

Mr. SMOOT. But the Senator does not claim that if the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, knowing such a state of affairs to exist, should report it to the Secretary of the Treasury under this section of the law the additional tax could be imposed.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, as I understand that provision of the law, it was intended to prevent the accumulation of net incomes for the purpose of evading the income-tax law. The Senator will remember that in the committee we had much discussion as to what this thing meant, and I think at least a majority of the committee felt that before the Secretary of the Treasury, under that provision of law, could ascertain what is necessary to be ascertained he would have to find, as a matter of fact, that the purpose of the retention was to defraud the Federal Government of its income taxes, a thing which so far has proven impracticable and which can never prove practicable, and which I will state to the Senator I expect to discuss a little later in connection with the proposal in the present law.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I do not believe there is a member of the committee or a Member of the Senate who will deny that there are corporations that have taken out the undistributed earnings and purchased bonds with them and purchased stocks of other companies that have no relation whatever to the business in which they are engaged. I can not help but believe that in a case like that the Secretary of the Treasury would immediately hold that it was something outside of the business for which they were organized, and if so there was only one reason for doing it, it was to escape taxation.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I hope a little later to make some observations upon the subject which will be interesting to the Senators in view of what the Senator has just stated.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator pardon me for another suggestion?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator is discussing this matter very ably and very interestingly, as he always does. The Senator says that he will later on discuss the subject I was calling to his attention a little while ago. That will be satisfactory to me.

But the Senator has read from certain tables in the minority report showing the amount of surplus retained, undistributed surplus of various and sundry corporations, 95, I think he said, in number. I wish to ask the Senator does he understand the amounts given in this table to represent the undistributed earnings of corporations for the year 1916, and not all the undistributed earnings of corporations, those 95 corporations, whether made in 1916 or in previous years; whether it represents the undistributed part of the earnings of 1916 or the total accumulation of undistributed earnings of the years past, including 1916?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I was a little uncertain in my own mind regarding the point which is just mentioned by the chairman of the committee, and so in my office I took occasion to verify the figures. I first ascertained that the figures given there as to railroad corporations were not correct, for the reasons which I stated a while ago. I assumed from that that we could not rely upon the figures as to the 95 corporations, but in the office I had one of my assistants take up that list of corporations and go through Moody's Manual to verify the figures, and while there was a little discrepancy, sometimes one way and sometimes the other, of more than 50 of those corporations, he verified the fact that the figures stated there were not the total surplus, but the surplus of current earnings of the year 1916. The Senator will find, if he will get the information which is furnished in Moody's Manual, that they are not accumulated surpluses in that table. It gives the accumulated surplus of the Santa Fe Railroad, for instance, at $6,000,000. The total accumulated surplus of the Santa Fe Railroad Co. is nearly $100,000,000; the Southern Pacific Railroad Co., $131,000,000; and the New York Central Railroad has investments in unaffiliated companies of nearly $150,000,000. The Ford Automobile Co. has $132,000,000 of assets, practically accumulated earnings, undistributed earnings, but the earnings for the last year were only $58,000,000.

Mr. President, I believe it has been shown that the existing law and the proposed law in this respect work a great injustice. I believe it is shown that the dollar of income of the corporation does not pay over one-half the tax that the dollar of income of the individual must pay. While I do not want to censure anybody who is doing business through a corporate agency, yet I do say that it is the duty of Congress to see that every dollar of income bears the same burden in carrying on this war and that the corporation shall not be favored to the extent of 50 per cent upon their net income.

Mr. President, when I first brought this matter to the attention of the committee I took the view of a corporation suggested by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], that the corporation was a mere trustee for its stockholders, that whatever affected the corporation affected the stockholders, and I thought it would be all right if we could in some way consider this undivided surplus or undivided net income as the property of the stockholder and have him pay an income tax upon it; but later insuperable objections arose. In the first place, I ascertained that the question whether under our constitutional provision you can so treat the income of the corporation as the income of the stockholder is involved in litigation now pending in the Supreme Court, and we did not want to put anything in the bill which is of questionable legality. Again, the shares of stock are being traded in from day to day. At what period would the stockholder have to pay the tax? So we found out that the inconvenience in the transfer of the shares was so great that that plan ought to be discarded, and it was discarded.

I want to state—and it is no secret in the committee, because it has been published in the papers—that when this situation was first presented to the Finance Committee every member of the committee but one voted in favor of putting a surtax upon undistributed corporate earnings, and later on when that bill was reported to the Senate it contained a provision imposing a tax of 15 per cent, but making an exemption of 20 per cent of income and exempting to railroads all the money which the Interstate Commerce Commission should say ought to be put into extensions and betterments. I thought they had emasculated it enough, but I concluded to support that provision rather than have none. But, as you all know, the bill was subsequently recommitted at the request of the chairman, and a marvelous change now appears in the bill. So, instead of the 15 per cent tax with the 20 per cent exemption, you find a 10 per cent tax and an exemption of everything required or reasonably necessary for the purpose of carrying on the business of the company, a provision which to my mind is absolutely inoperative and will not produce one dollar of revenue.

I will examine the bill somewhat in detail and I wish to read it. This is an amendment to section 10 of the act of September 8, 1916. It says:

(2) Section 10 of such act of September 8, 1916, is hereby further amended by adding a new subdivision as follows:

"(b) In addition to the income tax imposed by subdivision (a) of this section there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid annually an additional tax of 10 per cent upon the amount, remaining undistributed six months after the end of each calendar or fiscal year, of the total net income of every corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company, received during the year, as determined for the purposes of the tax imposed by such subdivision (a), but including the amount allowed as a credit under subdivision (d) of section 12."

That is to be ascertained in the same way that the present taxes are ascertained.

The tax imposed by this subdivision shall not apply to that portion of such undistributed net income which is actually invested and employed in the business or is retained for employment in the reasonable requirements of the business: Provided, That if the Secretary of the Treasury ascertains and finds that any portion of such amount so retained at any time for employment in the business is not so employed or is not reasonably required in the business a tax of 15 per cent shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid thereon, and the finding and ruling of the Secretary of the Treasury in any and all such cases shall be conclusive and final.

Mr. President, under that provision the duty is imposed upon the Secretary of the Treasury to ascertain the reasonable business requirements of every corporation in the United States. It is estimated that next year there will be 400,000 of them, and he is to find out not only what they are doing but whether they ought to do it or not; to ascertain the reasonable requirements of every line of business under the sun, a task absolutely impossible of execution, not only as to the varied classes of business of the country but by reason of the enormous task of doing it. You would have to get experts in every line of business; you would probably have to double the force of the Treasury Department to do it.

It is impossible from another point of view. What are the reasonable business requirements of the corporation? What is the business in which its capital may be employed or for which it may be reserved to be employed? How are you going to ascertain what is the business of the corporation?

Mr. President, there is only one way and that is by reading the charter of the corporation. I have here to-day the charters of a number of corporations of the country which I intended to read but I am not going to take the time of the Senate to do it, because every lawyer in the Senate knows that under the charter of the average corporation you can do almost any business known to man. If you organize a cattle company, if you organize a farming company, if you organize a flouring-mill company, it is the practice of lawyers throughout the country to put into the charter nearly every line of business conceivable, including the buying and selling and the dealing in stocks and bonds. Take the charter of the Carnegie Steel Co. which I have here. It can perform almost any business function conceivable by the human brain. How else can you say that the business of the corporation can be ascertained?

I want to say that if the charters do not contain these provisions they can be made to contain them in 24 hours. Under the laws of New Mexico you can organize a corporation for any lawful purpose. You can by it, under one charter, perform as many lines of business as you may seek to perform. All you have got to do is to pay a small fee upon taking out articles of incorporation. You never have to pay any subsequent franchise tax. So how will you ascertain the business requirements of these corporations? Search the charter. You will find the corporation can employ itself in many avenues; and can you go beyond the charter? If you do, where are you going? What kind of a duty do you impose upon the Secretary of the Treasury when you go beyond the articles of incorporation?

They may not be performing every designated power to-day, but there is no reason why they shall not do it to-morrow. I want to say that if this provision remains in the bill as it is to-day we will not collect one dollar of revenue, but we will jeopardize the collection of $450,000,000 of surtax now imposed upon individual incomes. That is what will happen. If this provision remains in the bill, there is no reason why every individual should not incorporate his business; why every professional man even, every individual engaged in any line, should not incorporate his business within 24 hours and have a legitimate corporation performing a legitimate business, but a business as varied as the industries of the country. So I say to the Finance Committee and to the Senate that if this provision is put into the bill we run the risk of being deprived of a large share of the $450,000,000 of revenue which it is planned to raise under this bill on surtaxes upon individuals.

Mr. President, the chairman of the committee stated a while ago that the committee had undertaken to compensate in some way for this surtax imposed upon individuals, and had done it by increasing the normal tax upon corporate incomes by 2 per cent. That will raise, without any doubt in my mind, $180,000,000 revenue. It will not equal the surtax which individuals will pay upon just about one-half the money which that 2 per cent will be levied upon. It will raise $180,000,000, whereas the surtaxes on individual incomes are expected to raise $450,000,000. But that tax, even if levied, does not reach the evil inherent in existing legislation and which is proposed to be perpetuated. Why do we put a graduated tax upon incomes of individuals? Because it is thought that those having the largest incomes can more equitably shoulder a greater percentage of the burden. Why do we impose a graduated tax upon war profits under this bill? For the same reason—that the concern that is making a larger percentage of war profits can afford to pay a larger percentage of this tax. That is what we do under the income-tax law upon individuals, and the war-profits tax is imposed upon individuals and corporations alike; but when it comes to getting a substitute for the surtax upon individuals, we find the normal tax increased, violating the very fundamental principle of the graduated tax in other respects.

We shall find the effect of it will be that the business concern which is doing a conservative business, which is retaining in its business a moderate amount of its income, will be taxed upon what it retains a very much larger percentage than is the corporation which retains more. Under the provisions of this bill if a corporation retains all of its net earnings it only pays a tax of 2 per cent; if it retains 90 per cent the tax which it would pay would be only 2.22 per cent of the amount retained. If it retains 80 per cent, the tax gets a little higher; it is 2.85 per cent. If it retains 50 per cent, the tax amounts to only 4 per cent upon the amount retained; but it mounts higher as the percentage retained decreases. If 10 per cent only is retained, the tax is 20 per cent; if 5 per cent is retained, the tax is 40 per cent; if 3 per cent is retained, the tax is 66⅔ per cent; having exactly the opposite effect from that which we want to bring about. It is an encouragement to corporations to retain their entire net income. If they retain it all, they only have to pay the 2 per cent normal tax on it. Take the United Verde Copper Co., which has a capital stock of $3,000,000, paying out annually only $270,000 in dividends, but actually earning, according to every report, from $10,000,000 to $12,000,000 a year. It is owned practically by one man. If he had the $10,000,000 a year as his individual income, under this bill we would take nearly one-half of it; but under the bill as proposed, if he leaves it in the corporation he pays only 2 per cent of it, or $200,000. Will he not do it? That is a copper mining company; I venture to say that the charter of that company permits its board of directors to engage in almost any line of business. It can very well be said that they want to buy other copper properties; that they want to build other smelting plants. How would this matter be controlled or regulated by the Secretary of the Treasury? When you undertake to impose upon the Secretary of the Treasury that duty as to that corporation you must impose it upon him as to the other 400,000 corporations in this country.

Mr. President, what should be done? I think the proposal of the committee is a confession of failure to solve the problem. The problem is here. How shall we solve it?

It has been proposed that we levy a tax of 10 per cent upon the retained and undistributed net earnings of corporations. If the corporations were to retain—not $5,000,000,000 but a little less—four and a half billion dollars, a tax of 10 per cent would produce $450,000,000, precisely the same as the amount which we expect from surtaxes on individual incomes. Just how much tax should be levied no man can say; it is an arbitrary amount to be fixed; but why should not it be put at, say, 10 per cent. Under the bill that was presented here before by the committee an exemption from taxation of 20 per cent of the whole income was provided. I thought with such an exemption a tax of 15 per cent was probably too low, but the committee brought in a tax of 15 per cent. Now, however, that the Senate has to deal with the matter let us see if we can not do something that is right.

The surtax on individuals ranging from 1 to 13 per cent under the old law and from 1 to 33 per cent under the proposed law, makes a total graduated surtax of from 1 per cent to 50 per cent. How can we fix a tax upon these retained corporate earnings which will in some measure equalize this burden? If we impose, as I have said, a tax of 10 per cent, if the corporations of the country retain an income of four and a half billion dollars, then we would get a revenue of $450,000,000, the same as the amount expected to come from individual surtaxes. That 10 per cent would be a flat rate. We can not graduate the tax upon corporate net earnings the same as we do upon individual net earnings without doing some of the large corporations of the country a great injustice. Take the United States Steel Corporation with a net income of over $200,000,000 a year. If we applied the surtax to its income the same as to that of an individual having the same amount of income, the corporation would have to pay almost one-half of it for the income tax alone. In my opinion that would not be right, although it may be that the view will be urged upon the Senate that it is right; it was urged upon the committee, and it may be urged here, but it seems to me that it would be unfair, because these large corporations ordinarily have a considerable number of stockholders who, if the total income were distributed, would not pay any surtax. It would hardly be right to impose the same surtax upon them as upon the most wealthy class of people in the country. But we ought to do something, and so the suggestion is that we impose a tax of 10 per cent upon these incomes.

Objection has been made to that. During the interim between the bringing of the first bill from the Finance Committee and the second bill representatives of corporations from one end of this country to the other appeared in Washington and discussed this question, I presume, with every member of the committee. They tried to have us believe that such a tax would force the corporations to distribute all of their net income in dividends and that that would bankrupt the corporations. The statement was made in the opening debate on this bill by the chairman of the committee that we would bring bankruptcy to these corporations.

Mr. President, these corporations would still have the management of their affairs in their own hands. If they wanted to distribute their earnings so as to evade the tax and commit corporate suicide it would be their sweet privilege to do so, but I do not believe they would do it; I believe that after this tax were imposed it would be found that the managers of these corporations would be just as sane as they were before, and that if they felt it was going to injure the corporation to distribute this fund they would not do it. I do not believe that such action on our part would make suicides of the corporations of this country.

Moreover, it would not be to the interest of the corporation to distribute this money if it needed additional money in its business. To-day first-class railroad bonds bearing 4 per cent interest are selling at 88 cents on the dollar in the general market. There is not a better railroad bond in this country than the first-mortgage bond of the Sante Fe Railroad Co., and yet those bonds are quoted to-day upon the New York Stock Exchange at 88 cents on the dollar. In order for a first-class corporation in these times to obtain new capital it has to issue gilt-edged 4 or 5 per cent bonds. By the issuance of such bonds they would pay annually the 4 or 5 per cent and ultimately would have to repay the principal; but if a corporation retains its net income or if, after the payment of dividends, it adds net income to its capital stock, it obtains new capital without the payment of any interest and will never have to repay the principal. Under those circumstances, do Senators believe that corporations would distribute all their net income? The statement that they would seems to me to be trifling with intelligence. I think the business men of this country have too much at heart the business interests of the country and their own interests.

Some of the directors of corporations appeared before some members of the committee and said that the stockholders would be clamoring for more dividends. I asked one of these gentlemen if he did not believe that a majority of the stockholders should rule. He said "No." I do; and when any number of stockholders are led to believe that if they distribute the corporate income they would bankrupt the corporation, there is no set of stockholders in the country who would advocate any such policy.

Another objection made was that if they distributed these funds the stockholders would get more money than they ought to have; that they would become spendthrifts. Mr. President, I do not believe that we ought to try by a revenue bill to control the conduct of the stockholders of corporations in this regard, while, on the other hand, I think a good many stockholders in the country would like to have the opportunity of handling some of their own funds, which they have not got now. It might be that a few more individual stockholders would want to invest in liberty bonds,

Mr. President, another reason urged for not imposing this tax is, as it is said, that the corporations need the money; that these are strenuous times and we want business to advance. So we do; we do not want unduly to hamper corporations or any line of business; but, Mr. President, do they not need the money which they now pay on account of other taxes just as much as they need every dollar of this money, if it is collected from them and if it is a fair tax? So when they present that argument it is an argument against the imposition of any tax. If you ever admit that any of these corporations should be subjected to the payment of taxes the same as individuals in the country, you can not escape the logic that they should be subjected to the payment of this tax.

Another objection made is that the corporations have made contracts whereby they must create sinking funds. That is true. Individuals also try to create sinking funds with which to pay their debts, but the individuals have to pay a tax upon the income they reserve for any such purpose. The fund will ultimately be used in the payment of debts. Why should not corporations pay a tax upon such funds the same as any individual and the same as upon any other income?

Mr. President, I do not believe the corporations are objects of charity, and yet charity is what they are asking when they seek to escape this surtax. The table which I presented a while ago regarding the banks of the country gave some interesting figures. All the banks of the city of New York have a surplus already accumulated of $434,000,000, while their capital stock is only $236,000,000. Do you think those banks are objects of charity to such an extent that they should have just and fair taxes remitted in their favor? So with the national banks of the whole country. With a capital stock of $1,066,000,000 they have surplus and undivided profits of $1,037,000,000 accumulated already. Are they objects of charity entitled to demand the remission of a just tax?

That is not all. There was a table presented to me which showed the amount of surplus accumulated by a large number of corporations—not accumulated in one year, but what they have and what they carry as surplus to-day. Most of the corporations of the country as they build up a surplus from year to year appropriate that surplus to some betterment or some extension, and it is then no longer called surplus; but the amount carried upon the books as surplus has been stated in this document with this result: Eighty-eight industrial corporations now have an unappropriated surplus of $452,000,000, 43 iron and steel corporations have an unappropriated surplus of $504,000,000, 15 mining corporations have an unappropriated surplus of $99,000,000, 6 motor companies have an unappropriated surplus of $51,000,000, 33 railroads have an unappropriated surplus of $517,000,000, and 185 miscellaneous corporations have an accumulated unappropriated surplus of $1,626,000,000.

Not long since, Mr. President, there was before the Interstate Commerce Commission what is known as the Fifteen Per Cent Rate case. There was in evidence an exhibit regarding railroads doing about 63 per cent of the business of the country. The effort was made to make it appear that the railroads were in very straitened circumstances, and so the facts were gathered and most interesting information was disclosed. Figures as to a number of these corporations are given and the amount of the capital obligations, the property investment according to book value, the unappropriated surplus, the net balance of current assets over liabilities, and the investments in unaffiliated corporations—most interesting and useful information. I will not undertake to read it, but it shows to me—and it showed to the Interstate Commerce Commission—that the railroads are earning enough and that they are able to pay their just taxes to the country.

For the information of the Senate I ask permission to have these tables printed as an appendix to my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Without objection the request will be granted.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Just a few statements in regard to some of these corporations.

The Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe last year appropriated out of income for investment in physical property $7,000,000, and the accumulated appropriations of this nature as shown in the balance sheet are $64,037,688, which does not include the improvements which may have been included in operating expenses resulting from a liberal maintenance policy. This company in this year paid dividends amounting to $18,690,965. After deducting the $7,000,000 and $18,690,965 above referred to, as well as other charges, it still increased its credit balance in profit and loss from $20,581,222 at the beginning of the year to $26,681,975 at the close of the year.

Another illustration is the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy. It shows in its balance sheet for the year ending June 30, 1916, an accumulated profit and loss credit balance of $105,088,276, which is almost equal to its entire capital stock of $110,839,100, the net increase in this balance in one year being $7,208,622, after it had paid $8,867,128 in dividends, appropriated $4,431,360 for investments in physical property, and had made $8,400,000 miscellaneous appropriations of income.

Among the southern roads, the Louisville & Nashville had in that year a very substantial net income of $14,039,130. It paid $4,320,000 in dividends and tucked nearly all of the remainder away in its surplus, which at the close of the year amounted to $50,172,752.

The Delaware, Lackawanna & Western is another road that would not be prostrated by the proposed 15 per cent tax. It has practically no funded debt. Its surplus is greater than its capital stock. The capital stock is less than the additions which have been made to the property through charges to income and surplus. Its dividend rate was 20 per cent in 1916, and yet there was enough left to make new investments of $2,056,742 and to increase the surplus $5,734,792.

Mr. President, what would these corporations do with this money which ought to be paid into the Federal Treasury as a tax? We can only answer that question by considering what they have done with their net income in the past. For a number of years it was the custom, in the organization of corporations, to put a lot of water into the stock of the company. They would issue bonds about equal to all of the actual cash invested. Later on they would keep putting in the surplus earnings so as to squeeze out the water. Not simply one corporation did that but it was the rule, known to every one of us, with the average industrial corporations, especially, and with the railroad corporations of the country. If corporations are to be thus organized, it is a commendable thing to do. If you agree that the system is right, it is good business to do it.

In 1898 the Santa Fe road was a single-track road, unballasted, across the country, with small rails, small equipment, with its adjustment bonds selling at 65, with its preferred stock selling at 23, with its common stock selling at 11. To-day the adjustment bonds are selling where any 4 per cent second-mortgage bonds should sell, the preferred stock is selling at about par, the common stock has sold as high as 121 and is now selling at par. They have as fine a roadbed as there is in this country. There is no better equipment anywhere; there is no better railroad service in the country and, I think, the best railroad managers in the country. This is what that company has done out of the accumulated net income—a splendid thing—but in order to accomplish it do you think the Federal Government ought to donate just and fair taxes?

The United States Steel Corporation was organized with capital and a bond issue of over $1,400,000,000. The Federal Corporation Commission, upon investigation in 1911, found that the actual value of the assets that went into that concern did not exceed $700,000,000, and to-day the common stock is selling at 125. How has it been done? By retaining its surplus earnings in the business.

I am not criticizing what has been done. I say if they want to do that sort of thing let them do it; but if they use net income in this time of war, let them pay upon that income the same tax that you would impose upon an individual.

Mr. President, I have talked far longer than I intended to talk. I am glad to have had an opportunity to present this question to the Senate, and I offer now an amendment to the bill as reported by the committee, which I will read.

After the formal part, on pages 111 and 112, I move to strike out all of the bill, beginning with line 17 on page 111, down to and including line 15 on page 112, and instead thereof to insert the following:

(2) Section 10 of such act of September 8, 1916, is hereby further amended by adding a new subdivision, as follows:

"(b) In addition to the income tax imposed by subdivision (a) of this section there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid annually an additional tax of 10 per cent upon the amount remaining undistributed to stockholders 60 days after the end of each calendar or fiscal year of the total net income of every corporation, joint-stock company, or association or insurance company received during the year, as determined for the purposes of the tax imposed by such subdivision (a) but including the amount allowed as a credit under subdivision (d) of section 12."

The tax imposed by this subdivision shall not apply to (1) sum of $5,000 of such undistributed net income, (2) such portion of such net income necessarily retained by such corporations, joint-stock companies or associations, or insurance companies for the purpose of paying any taxes becoming due to the Federal Government for such calendar or fiscal year.

I should like to offer the amendment, and ask that it may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request of the Senator from New Mexico will be complied with.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If the Senate should fail to adopt that amendment, then I purpose to modify it by inserting an exception or exemption from this 10 per cent tax of 10 per cent of the net income. If that should not be accepted by the Senate, then I purpose to offer an amendment increasing the exemption to 20 per cent. If that is not accepted by the Senate, then I purpose to offer an amendment making the tax 5 per cent, without any exemption.

Mr. President, I feel that we have here a problem. I feel that it vitally affects the interests of this country. I do not pretend that I have been able to solve the problem as it should be solved, but I do want to sound the alarm. I do want to call the attention of the Senate to this glaring injustice, that it is jeopardizing $450,000,000 of revenue expected to be raised by this bill from surtaxes upon individual incomes. I want to call the attention of the Senate to this condition, and invite the wisdom of the Senate to take hold of this problem and aid in its solution.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, will the Senator please inform the Senate whether, in case the amendment he has just tendered is adopted, he would favor reducing the excise tax on corporations as recommended by the committee?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the excise tax does not amount to very much, and it might be that we would feel like reducing that, or eliminating it. I have not given that question any particular study.

Mr. HOLLIS. Does the Senator believe that his amendment, if adopted, would produce more revenue than the increase in the excise tax on corporations suggested by the committee?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I think it would; very much more.

Mr. HOLLIS. Can the Senator tell how much more?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have estimated here that the corporations would probably retain in their surplus account, after the payment of dividends, from four and a half to five billions of dollars; and a tax of 10 per cent upon that would be four hundred and fifty or five hundred million dollars.

Mr. HOLLIS. And what is the estimate of the majority of the committee that the additional 2 per cent excise tax on corporations would raise?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. One hundred and eighty million dollars. I did not know just what the Senator had in his mind in regard to the excise tax. We have been using the term "excise tax" with reference to another provision of law; but the tax which the Senator has in mind will produce about $180,000,000.

APPENDIX A.

Certain income account items for all roads reporting railway operating revenues of $10,000,000 or more for year ended Dec. 31, 1916.

[Compiled from reports to the Interstate Commerce Commission.]

These reports of December 31, 1916, are the latest annual figures available and are used in the following statement, which shows certain selected items from the income account. All roads having operating revenues of $10,000,000 or more are listed.

The following explanation of the column headings should be noted:

(a) Total operating income is what is left from operating revenues (shown in column i) after operating expenses and taxes are paid. Operating expenses include maintenance and depreciation charges.

(b) Nonoperating income includes rents received and returns on investments.

(c) Gross income is the sum of (a) and (b).

(d) Net income is what is left from gross income after rentals, interest on funded debt, etc., are paid. This is not necessarily the same as "total net income" of the income tax law.

(e) Dividends are sometimes charged to income and sometimes against profit and loss. The former appear in column (e) and the latter in column (j).

(f) Net income, less dividends paid from income, would be an approximation of the sum upon which the 15 per cent would be levied, but not exactly.

(g) Total taxes includes all classes of railway taxes, including those shown under (h).

(h) Taxes paid to the United States Government include the income tax as well as other United States taxes.

Name of road.	Total operating income. (a)	Non-operating income. (b)	Gross income. (c)	Net income. (d)	Dividend appropriations of income. (e)	Net income less dividend appropriations of income. (f)	Total taxes. (g)	Taxes paid to United States Government. (h)	Railway operating revenues. (i)	Dividends paid from surplus. (j)

APPENDIX B.

[Before the Interstate Commerce Commission Ex parte 57. In re application of the railways of the United States for a general advance in freight rates of 15 per cent. The Fifteen Per Cent case. Compiled by the National Shippers' Conference. Funds immediately available of carriers handling two-thirds of the traffic. S. H. Cowan, Clifford Thorne, Luther M. Walter, Graddy Cary, Clyde L. King, committee.]

STATEMENT RELATIVE TO REVISION OF EXHIBIT CARY NO. 1.

In order that there may be no possible confusion about the ultimate showing of this exhibit, we here present a revise of said exhibit to conform to suggestions made by Mr. Nay, the witness for the railroads.

This exhibit as now revised adopts every figure suggested by Mr. Nay with the one exception of a deduction of $35,418,052 for the depreciation of securities of unaffiliated companies held in the treasury of the Union Pacific. We did not make this deduction for the reason that Mr. Nay admitted on cross-examination that $50,000,000 had been appropriated and set aside out of surplus by the Union Pacific in 1913 to cover a depreciation on these very securities. Having been once deducted, it would be an error to again deduct it.

Certain it is that if the above item is deducted from the unaffiliated securities of the Union Pacific it should at the same time be added to the unappropriated surplus of the Union Pacific.

Mr. Lamb, witness for the southern carriers, undertook to point out errors in the exhibit upon the ground that "company figures" and not "system figures" had been used. The exhibit as originally prepared clearly shows "company figures" to have been used, and the figures originally used were and are correct.

Every figure on this exhibit as now offered, with the exceptions above mentioned, has been approved by the carriers in the testimony of their witnesses.

The purpose of this exhibit is to show that the carriers handling two-thirds of the traffic have enormous sums immediately available, that their property investment since 1907 is greatly increased out of earnings, and that if an advance should be granted two-thirds of the total advance would go to carriers whose present financial condition is such that they are not in need of any relief.

The volume of the traffic is handled by carriers now in a prosperous condition, and whose net incomes in the past have not only been sufficient to pay them a handsome return but have enabled them to accumulate out of earnings funds immediately available to more than adequately meet any emergency, even one founded on mere predictions.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the section of the bill that the Senator from New Mexico has been so interestingly discussing is not the immediate question before the Senate. When that is reached I shall supplement what I had to say in my general statement by a brief discussion of the points that have been made by the Senator. At present, however, I do not care to pursue that question further.

Mr. JOHNSON of California obtained the floor.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. I rise for the purpose of suggesting the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Husting	Nelson	Simmons
Brady	James	New	Smith, Md.
Broussard	Johnson, Cal.	Newlands	Smith, Mich.
Calder	Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Smith, S. C.

Hale	McKellar	Saulsbury	Williams
Hardwick	McNary	Shafroth
Hollis	Myers	Sheppard

Mr. HUSTING. I have been requested to announce the unavoidable absence, on official business, of the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, the observations I desire to submit upon this measure are general in character, but none the less, from the standpoint of some of us, quite fundamental.

The design that I have in speaking in general terms to this measure, in voicing my opposition to the rates that are in this measure prescribed under certain captions, is that ultimately we may do that which is best for all the people of the Nation, and that behind the line of trenches which will be ours in the near future we may have a contented people, a people not irritated by any sense of injustice or inequality in taxation, and that finally we may not only conscript the blood of this Nation but we may conscript the part of the wealth of this Nation that is coined out of its blood. It is with this idea in view that I have the temerity to speak upon a measure to which the Finance Committee of the Senate have devoted so much time, so much effort, so much conscientious labor, and on which they have done, indeed, such very great work.

I recognize, Mr. President, just as all Senators and just as all our people recognize to-day, the Herculean and stupendous task which we have undertaken—a task that in all the history of this world never has been undertaken before. Not only do we, the great democracy of the world, go forth to fight the greatest military power on earth, but we have undertaken as well to finance in part every nation at war with this great military power. We have undertaken, too, to supply foods and fuels and munitions to all of those at war with the Teutonic powers. We have undertaken, by embargo against the neutral nations of the earth, to prevent foods, fuels, munitions, and necessities going to any of our enemies; and beyond that we have undertaken, in this great adventure of ours, to augment, when necessary, the waning man power of our allies who are now locked in death struggle with the central powers of Europe—an undertaking, I say again, greater than that which history has yet recorded, an undertaking of more stupendous consequence than any country has ever yet seen fit to enter upon. In this undertaking we require not alone vision of the line of battle, not alone thought concerning what shall be done upon the firing line, not alone to march to the red resentment of the guns, but we require as well steady thought and undimmed vision of our domestic policies. It is necessary, too, that we should remember that this democracy of ours is after all the paramount thing in the struggle in which we now engage, and naught should be done by the Congress of the United States that will render that democracy, our democracy at home, discontented or irritable, or by any unequal, unjust, or unfair laws cause unrest.

The call to war has been variously described. I read you from a recent poem, which expresses, I think, with a virility no modern American poet yet has approached, this call:

Far and near, high and clear,
Hark to the call of war!
Over the gorse and the golden dells,
Ringing and swinging of clamorous bells,
Praying and saying of wild farewells—
War! War! War!

High and low, all must go;
Hark to the shout of war!
Leave to the women the harvest yield;
Gird ye, men, for the sinister field;
A saber instead of a scythe to wield—
War! Red war!

Rich and poor, lord and boor,
Hark to the blast of war!
Tinker and tailor and millionaire,
Actor in triumph and priest in prayer,
Comrades now in the hell out there,
Sweep to the fire of war!

Prince and page, sot and sage,
Hark to the roar of war!
Poet, professor, and circus clown,
Chimney sweeper and fop o' the town,
Into the pot and be melted down
Into the pot of war.

Women all, hear the call,
The pitiless call of war!
Look your last on your dearest ones,
Brothers and husbands, fathers, sons,
Swift they go to the ravenous guns,
The gluttonous guns of war.

With a boundless enthusiasm, Senators, we conscripted, in a very brief period, the youth of this land. With an enthusiasm that would brook no delay on the part of any Senator upon this floor or of any man in all this Nation we took our youth and sent that youth forth to fight for this Nation, and to die, if necessary, upon a foreign soil. I ask that you have the same enthusiasm for conscripting the wealth of the Nation to-day to stand behind the lads that have gone forth to fight our battle over the seas. In asking this of you I ask naught that interferes with legitimate enterprise or with going business concerns. I ask that you do that upon which in your enthusiasm you insisted when you told us that every boy in this land should be immediately drafted and sent forth to fight for his country—follow the example and experience of our ally over the sea. I ask that you conscript your war profits, and I ask a response as ready to the experience of Britain as you gave in conscripting our youth.

It is with a true vision, we think, of that which is to transpire in the future, with a knowledge of something of that which, by and by, may happen to us here and may happen upon that foreign shore for the preservation—if you wish to use the trite terms so often used—of world democracy, that we would have this wealth conscripted without injury to legitimate enterprise or legitimate business.

Those who coin the blood of war are the ones best able to pay the expense of war. Those who make swollen war profits out of this particular exigency are those who ought to pay for the cost of this war. It is, indeed, to me quite a trivial thing to take from the swollen fortunes that have come from war in the last couple of years the little moiety that this bill, by the majority report, takes; and that we are not, indeed, at variance concerning the purpose of the Nation or whence the revenue should be derived for ultimately permitting this war to be carried on the utterances of the chairman of the Finance Committee and those of the Members who have followed him show very, very plainly.

I quote what was said by the Senator who leads the Finance Committee and who delivered a most remarkable address upon this measure. He said we were "imposing upon the people of this country the greatest burden of taxation ever put upon them." Quite true; but we are imposing upon these people as well greater governmental burdens and greater sacrifices than ever before have been put upon any people upon the face of the earth. We are staggered when we think of the amount of money thus far required this year in this undertaking—$20,000,000,000. I confess that it is infinite to me. In my last days in college, when we were made to wrestle with higher mathematics, I was taught that two parallel lines met in infinity. I never could grasp it, and I never could understand it. To talk of $20,000,000,000 expended or incurred in liabilities before a single shot has been fired, before there have been any actual hostilities upon our part in this great undertaking, is infinity to me and wholly beyond my financial understanding.

Our people can perhaps appreciate it when they recall that the entire cost of the Civil War, four years of internecine strife such as the world never before had seen, was $2,500,000,000, and the sums to-day for which we are liable and the sums for which we may become liable a year hence are so enormous that the imagination halts at the very expression or suggestion of those sums.

I doubt not if we proceed in the fashion in which we are proceeding that a year hence the liability of the United States will exceed the liability possibly incurred in this war by any contending nation. All this we are willing to do. All this our people are willing to do. But in doing it, in accepting not alone the burden placed upon them, a burden greater than was ever placed upon any other people, but also in responding with their best beloved and their blood, they ask that that burden, as much of it as possible, be taken from those who make profit out of this war and out of this crisis.

The chairman of the Finance Committee in speaking of this bill has said:

> In fixing the rates upon incomes and profits to keep in mind the amount derived from these sources would depend upon the activity and prosperity of business and that to impose a tax which would tend to discourage enterprises and check these activities would tend to defeat the legislative purpose by reducing the revenue expected from the tax * * * little margin would be left for future increases * * * to leave resources to draw upon.

I submit that his argument in that behalf is wholly fallacious. The war profits are derived from the war and the war alone. Let the war cease the 1st day of December next, or within the next year, and the war profits then cease. Is it wise statesmanship, therefore, to look to a time in the future when there may be no war profits, with the expectation at that time in the future, when the war has ceased and there are no war profits, to tax these particular swollen fortunes?

I submit to you there can be no future as to these war profits, because they are fleeting, ephemeral at best, lasting alone with the war, with the exigency, with the strife, and with the conflict, ceasing the very moment that the war ceases, the very moment that the conflict is at an end.

So I insist that we proceed to take the largest share of these war profits that it is possible to take in this conjuncture of affairs and to devote those war profits to the prosecution of the particular enterprise which itself makes the war profits.

Again the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance said:

> Who can successfully attack the wisdom or equity of the bill? Certainly as applied to this class of corporations which, while it brings to the Government a tax of 44 per cent upon the profits, leaves to the common stockholders—and they are the owners of the property—after all expenses and all taxes have been paid a net return of $50 a share upon stock that represents probably much less than $50 of actual investment.

Pause, please, and see just this argument of the majority of the committee submitted upon this bill. Who can successfully attack the wisdom or the equity of the bill? I pass the encomiums which, of course, will be given to it by the great corporations with their tremendous profits in this war, but the wisdom and the equity of the bill in the amount that it raises will be attacked and will be questioned—justly attacked, legitimately questioned—by the men and the women who give their sons to the cause, and the men and the women who have put upon them a tax on their tea and coffee and their postage and their little things of everyday life, taxed in order that a sum shall be raised that may eke out the great sum from these particular corporations that have profited by the war.

In the portion of the remarks quoted, the Senator, who is chairman of the Finance Committee, was speaking of the figures of the great Steel Corporation, and I refer to this corporation not in an invidious sense at all, but because it has been used by way of example upon this floor again and again in this debate. Just imagine what we do. We give to the Steel Corporation a dividend first upon its preferred stock. Then I use the language of the distinguished Senator who is the chairman of the Finance Committee; we permit it to pay all its expenses and all its taxes of every kind and every nature, and then we give to this Steel Corporation, in our time of stress and in our time of dire need, when every man's heart is bleeding for his loved ones that go beyond the sea, a dividend equal to more than has been paid in upon its capital stock.

How the people must laugh to scorn a Congress that deals thus tenderly with war profits while dealing with such severity with the common human clay to be put up against the gun! To the Steel Corporation is returned under the bill nearly $300,000,000 war profits for this year; not of ordinary profits, mind you, but of war profits, computed under the terms of this bill. Congress hands to the Steel Corporation, because, forsooth, it has coined the blood and the bone and the sinew of the land into dollars the monstrous sum of nearly three hundred millions,

Can you justify it? Can you justify it particularly at this time, when you demand the maximum of human sacrifice?

The distinguished Senator who is chairman of the Finance Committee says, "But truly this is a war-profits tax." Oh, no; this is no war-profits tax. This is a tax by which you just touch the war profits of those who have grown wealthy out of the conflict. It is but the shadow and the shade of taxation, with profits undreamed of still remaining with the corporation.

I listened upon the floor of the Senate to man after man telling us when we were debating the draft bill how England and Englishmen thought that it was absolutely essential that in the very beginning of this conflict the inexorable and drastic draft be applied to our people. I listened seven different times while I heard eloquent gentlemen tell of the Princess Pat's regiment; how they were mowed down, because, forsooth, they were volunteers and had answered their country's call. They were volunteers, and they went to the front and did their duty and their bit, and many bravely fighting for their country were slain. They are on the highest honor roll of this war. Their organization was presented to us as an argument against permitting men voluntarily to fight for their country.

Again I heard eloquent Senators tell us that in the beginning of this strife here in your free democracy our men must be drafted and drafted at once, and that the dramatic or the emotional should never be permitted to enter into the war. We, as patriotic Senators, believing in the necessity because the Commander in Chief asked it, drafted the young men of this land in the very first instance and gave to the Commander in Chief this great body of our youth. Whence this enthusiasm for taking our blood and the tenderness in protecting the wealth that comes from that blood?

England to-day takes 80 per cent of the war profits there to run the war. Do you realize how much we take based upon the minimum of $3,000,000,000 war profits for the last year? We take additionally under this bill less than 20 per cent and England takes to-day 80 per cent of war profits.

I would not have you follow blindly, of course, the advice either of allies or of neutral nations. I would not of course ask the Senate under any circumstances to follow another nation in taking an undue proportion of war profits merely because that other nation did it. But, oh, how persuasive indeed, how convincing were the arguments of what England did when we dealt with our blood, and how little persuasive and little convincing those arguments are when we deal with our wealth. So I submit, for what it is worth, that England takes 80 per cent of its war profits to-day while under this bill we take less than 20 per cent of our war profits.

The estimated war profits, according to the figures stated by the distinguished Senator who is chairman of the Finance Committee, were $3,000,000,000. He stated that as a minimum sum. The war-profits tax in this bill amounts to $562,000,000, a little less than 20 per cent of the war profits. This year the war profits it is estimated will amount to $4,000,000,000 and more. Oh, think of what they come from, and why it is that they exist at all, and then understanding what makes them, and for such a brief period, why hesitate from taking the very largest portion of those war profits that it is possible to take in order to carry on our great adventure and in order to protect us from financial difficulty in our war?

I speak to you with some degree of emphasis upon this subject because in my humble and my limited way I have a vision concerning this particular conflict. It is a vision, of course, that I can speak of but for myself alone, and which of course binds none but me; but it is after all my vision of this great war, and because it is put in such succinct fashion, in a little brochure called The Menace of Peace, I read it to you:

> It matters infinitely which side shall win and what shall be the vision and the judgment of man as to the issues involved in the war. And the thing that urges and counts is not when the war shall end, but what it shall be seen to mean. For the war to close and the world not know what it has been fighting about would be the supreme catastrophe of history. A compromise between the contending belligerents would be a betrayal of the peoples of every nation and would issue in universal mental and moral confusion. A peace that leaves the nations where they were, that recognizes neither victor nor vanquished, that ignores the conflict's causes and questions, that evades all judgment as to the right or wrong of the matter—such a peace would be the last disaster of mankind. The millions who have died would have died in vain. The lessons of the last 2,000 years would have been written in the sands. The hard ascent of the race, from its beginning until now, would have conveyed no convoking and uniting purpose, no empowering and compelling prospect. The judgment day would have come and gone without our discerning the judgment passed upon us or even knowing we had been judged. The supreme opportunity of man would have proved itself greater than man.

It is because of this kind of vision upon the part of some of us, because we think, although we think only for ourselves and speak only for ourselves, that we believe we understand the underlying philosophy of this great conflict, that we begin now preparing not alone upon the lines far, far away, but preparing at home with the money that is necessary that that line may go to ultimate victory.

I have an abiding confidence in the American people. There has never been a time in all our history when the American people have not risen superior to any crisis and have done their full and their patriotic duty. All they ask is that they shall be treated with equality, with honesty, and with truth in this great cataclysm. The American people, with the burden that has been put upon them, with the sacrifices that are demanded of them, are entitled to equality in every law, to honesty and to truth.

To-day I think that I echo what is in every Senator's heart when I say that that has not been put forth to the American people which should be put forth in clarion tones unto them. The mode in which they are given their publicity now is here stated concretely in a very simple illustration. Recently a Japanese mission came to San Francisco. They arrived there on a certain day last week. Four weeks ago I had the invitation to attend the ceremonies and the various entertainments in behalf of that mission. For three weeks all the newspapers of the city of San Francisco have been exploiting the arrival of that mission and that mission's views; and here in Washington and in the East, although all California has published every detail, we read each day "at a Pacific port."

Can you tell me upon what principle that sort of dealing should be indulged in with a people intelligent and critical, a people patriotic, and a people self-sacrificing? We learn here the Japanese mission landed "at a Pacific port," and then, with the names carefully omitted, the various functions had in their behalf are told us. In my office are the San Francisco papers describing in detail all the dignitaries who were present and all the individuals who participated, and everything in respect to the matter.

It may be that in the peculiar and singular sort of mentality we now and then observe some gentlemen in Washington with a peculiar mental strabismus have thought that thus by saying "at a Pacific port," in Washington or in Brooklyn or in New York or in Boston by that very token we prevented any enemies there from knowing whence this particular delegation came or what was done in its behalf when it reached this Nation.

I mention this very slight example because it is typical, and for those who are striving with all their might, who are going forward with all the force they are capable of, who are, indeed, overflowing with patriotism and desire to serve their land, I ask publicity and truth in this war, nothing more than that, in return for their burden and in return for their sacrifices.

So much for our par-profit taxes. There is no justification, in my opinion, for returning two billions or more of war profits and taking only an additional half billion than there would be for putting all these taxes upon the ordinary man and putting upon that ordinary man every particle of the expenses of government. But more than two billions, under the statement of the chairman of the Finance Committee, are returned to the Steel Corporation, the Bethlehem Steel Co., the Du Pont Powder Works, and the rest—more than two billions of war profits for this year, and next year probably three billions of profits returned to them.

I insist that these rates should be raised so that practically every dollar under this bill may be raised by war-profits taxes, by income taxes, and by the taxes upon alcoholic beverages and the like, and that every consumer's tax that is in the bill, whether it be little or whether it be big, whether it touch one sort or one class or another class, shall be eliminated, and we take the money from where we ought to take it, from the very place where these people themselves are willing we should take it—from the war profits made out of this great conflict!

I have yet to hear any man who has made war profits of this sort object to the very largest conceivable percentage being taken in taxes. Why should we halt and hesitate and falter when we come to take the money from them, when they themselves are substantially willing it should be taken.

There is another feature of the bill—the income tax—to which we may look as well.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to correct the Senator from California with reference to two of his assumed facts. One is as to the amount of excess-profits tax as well as to the amount of revenue to be derived from excess-profits taxes. The Senator said it was $562,000,000, I think. The Senator is mistaken about that. The total amount——

Mr. JOHNSON of California. That is what I referred to entirely. If the Senator will permit me, I had no desire to do other than to suggest that was the additional sum that was taken under the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; the total amount taken under the bill. The bill also, as the Senator recalls, repeals an excess-profits tax law that would produce $226,000,000, and the total amount to be raised under the bill for war profits would be $788,000,000. Again, the Senator spoke of the 20 per cent tax.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I was referring to the excess tax of $562,000,000 as stated.

Mr. SIMMONS. Five hundred and sixty-two million dollars plus $226,000,000. The total amount carried in the bill is $788,000,000, only $562,000,000, however, being in excess of the amount of the present law.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. Another correction I wish to make, if the Senator please, is with reference to the war taxes. The Senator seems to be under the impression that the United States Steel Corporation would only pay at the rate of 20 per cent. As a matter of fact, the rate at which the Steel Corporation will pay under the bill is 44 per cent.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. How much on a profit of $500,000,000 will they pay?

Mr. SIMMONS. Upon the basis of their proposed earnings for 1917 they will pay at the rate of 44 per cent.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. It will be about $220,000,000, in round numbers, and I have been using round numbers entirely in speaking of the Steel Corporation. It will be about $220,000,000 in round numbers, computed upon the basis of war profits of $500,000,000 this year. That is correct, is it not? And the remainder, $270,000,000 or $280,000,000, will be returned to the Steel Corporation.

Mr. SIMMONS. The only point I desire to make to the Senator——

Mr. JOHNSON of California. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. SIMMONS. I understood the Senator was estimating that it would be at the rate of 20 per cent upon their war profits of 1917. I simply wanted to say to the Senator that upon a calculation made by the experts it is found that they will pay an average rate of 44 per cent upon their earnings for 1917, as forecast by their actual earnings during the first two quarters.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The Senator has utterly misunderstood what I have been saying in this regard.

Mr. SIMMONS. Possibly I have.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I quoted the Senator's figures, given by him and taken by me from the RECORD, that the minimum estimated total war profits would be $3,000,000,000 for the past year. I then quoted that the war-profits tax in this bill in excess would be $562,000,000, and that this is less than 20 per cent of the $3,000,000,000 of war profits. In addition to that, he has estimated $490,000,000 in his remarks as the profits of this year; but, in round numbers, I estimated the profits of the Steel Corporation—and I think I am borne out in that estimate by the figures—at $500,000,000 for this year; and out of this $500,0000,000—and I challenge contradiction of the statement—no greater sum than $220,000,000 or $230,000,000 would be taken; $270,000,000 or $280,000,000, speaking in round numbers, would be retained as war profits by the Steel Corporation under those circumstances. This being so, I say, and I repeat, that there can be no justification when lavishly you take the blood of this land for returning any corporation, even though it is the Steel Corporation, $270,000,000 or $280,000,000 of war profits, to be made now out of the blood of the loved ones of America.

I insist that the rate should be far higher than it is.

Now, turning, as I was about to turn at the time of the interruption of the Senator from North Carolina, to the income taxes that are imposed by the bill, I deal in general figures for the sake of brevity. The figures are before us here, not alone in the very excellent and eloquent speech of the Senator from North Carolina but in detail by the other speeches that have been made upon this measure. If you wish them in particular thousands and hundreds and cents, they are all here before us. I am dealing simply in round numbers and in figures which may be quickly and easily understood.

An interesting and illuminating thing in conjunction with the inheritance tax is the number of people in this Nation who pay taxes upon very large incomes. Before me I have not at the moment the particular rates levied by the bill, but the highest rate in excess levied by this bill—and I speak from memory—is 33 per cent in addition to the levies that are already made by other laws. The highest levy under existing law added to the 33 per cent, according to my recollection, makes 50 per cent, which is the total tax, the maximum, levied upon any income under any circumstances. The total sum levied under this bill is 33 per cent.

Recently, back in May indeed, I addressed a letter of inquiry to the Treasury Department for the purpose of ascertaining the number of people who paid taxes upon large incomes. In addressing that inquiry, of course, I was restricted to asking information that was not wholly confidential. I have, therefore, but the figures as contained in the letter of the acting commissioner, if any Senator shall desire to see that particular authority.

I find that in this Nation in the year 1915 the number of incomes over $1,000,000 and less than $2,000,000 was 93; the number of incomes over $2,000,000 and less than $3,000,000 was 15; the number of incomes over $3,000,000 and less than $4,000,000 was 8; the number of incomes over $4,000,000 and less than $5,000,000 was none; the number of incomes over $5,000,000 and less than $6,000,000 was none; the number of incomes over $6,000,000 and less than $7,000,000 was 1; the number of incomes over $8,000,000 and less than $9,000,000 was none; the number of incomes over $9,000,000 and less than $10,000,000 was 1; the number of incomes over $10,000,000 was 2; and the total number of incomes over $1,000,000 was 120.

This bill in levying a surtax upon incomes stops where? It stops at $500,000, and from $500,000 up to the income of $10,000,000 there is no differentiation in the rate at all. Thirty-three per cent is the rate upon an income of $500,000 a year, and 33 per cent is charged upon an income of $10,000,000 as well, under this bill.

I insist that in this time of stress if there are incomes in this Nation of over $10,000,000 we can take the larger part of such incomes at least, and we can devote them to protecting our land and protecting our Army and protecting our Navy. Thirty-three per cent added to what is already imposed upon these incomes makes the present income tax at its maximum 50 per cent.

Oh, the generosity of the Senate of the United States, that of an income of $10,000,000, in time of stress, we will take $5,000,000 and hand back to the impoverished possessor of that income $5,000,000 as well! What a terrible thing it is, what an assault upon business, what an endeavor to prevent the usual and ordinary currents of trade from proceeding in the usual and ordinary way that we give back to a man with an income of $10,000,000, $5,000,000! Think how cramped he will be in his living in the next year if he has only $5,000,000 upon which he may for himself and his family obtain the necessaries of life. A generous Congress, indeed, it is; tender, indeed, of these incomes, which stops with $500,000 and never puts another cent or another percentage by this bill upon incomes that exceed $500,000.

That I may not be misunderstood and that the Senator from North Carolina may not deem it necessary to interrupt, I say to him that in the other laws than this particular bill which we are now considering percentages of incomes have been taken upon sums far in excess of $500,000.

Of incomes in this time, war profits in this crisis, why should we not take the largest sum that can be taken; the largest amount that it is conceivable may be taken, and not leave, of course, the recipient of the income in rags or in tears or in starvation or in squalor? Why should we not take what we may for the public defense and the public weal? That we should take from these swollen war profits the very highest percentage, even as high as does England herself, it seems to me goes absolutely without saying, and that we should increase our income taxes proportionately is wholly justified.

Again, I advert to the suggestion that we must have a reserve in the future—a reserve of war profits upon which to draw. With war determined overnight, the profits are determined overnight, and the profits then safely remain in the pockets of the men who have made them, and we have not taken from this reserve at all. I submit, Mr. President, this time is one where there must be a tenderness alike for all things, human and material, and where, if it is necessary to do what we have done in respect to human beings—and I assume it to be necessary and I join in doing it because I deem it necessary—I insist that the necessity exists when dealing with money and with property, to have the same inexorable mental attitude which the Senate has displayed in dealing with flesh and blood.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inquire of the Senator from North Carolina to which section of the bill he now desires to direct attention?

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to inquire of Senators if any other Senator desires to address himself to any particular section of the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. Or the bill in general.

Mr. SIMMONS. Or the bill in general, of course. [A pause.] If no other Senator desires to proceed now, Mr. President, I would be very glad to take up the bill, commencing at the beginning. Temporarily, we passed over Titles I and II relating to incomes and excess profits. If there is any other section of the bill which can be taken up, I would be willing to have that course pursued until the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] can return to the Chamber. I desire to inquire if there is any objection to taking up——

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to state to the Senator in charge of the bill that, if it is within the rules of the Senate to do so, I shall offer a substitute for the entire bill as soon as I can revise it, and I shall desire to address myself to that substitute.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator desire to address himself to it now?

Mr. KING. Not at present; I hope to be able to do so to-morrow.

Mr. SIMMONS. I would be very glad to have the Senator go on now, as it would be a great convenience to the Senator from Wisconsin, who is really not quite ready to proceed this afternoon.

Mr. KING. I myself am not ready to proceed this afternoon, as I have not fully completed as yet some of the schedules of the proposed substitute I am preparing, and if I should attempt to address myself to the schedules now it would necessitate further observations at a subsequent time.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, to accommodate the Senator from Wisconsin, who is not in the Chamber, I will ask that the Secretary begin reading Title XII, income-tax amendments, with the understanding that upon request any of these amendments may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). The Secretary will state the amendment indicated.

The SECRETARY. On page 99, after line 15, the committee propose to insert the following:

TITLE XII.—INCOME-TAX AMENDMENTS.

SEC. 1200. That subdivision (a) of section 2 of such act of September 8, 1916, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(a) That, subject only to such exemptions and deductions as are hereinafter allowed, the net income of a taxable person shall include gains, profits, and income, derived from salaries, wages, or compensation for personal service of whatever kind and in whatever form paid, or from professions, vocations, businesses, trade, commerce, or sales, or dealings in property, whether real or personal, growing out of the ownership or use of or interest in real or personal property, also from interest, rent, dividends, securities, or the transaction of any business carried on for gain or profit, or gains or profits and income derived from any source whatever: Provided, That the term "dividends" as used in this title shall be held to mean any distribution made or ordered to be made by a corporation, joint-stock company, association, or insurance company, out of its earnings or profits accrued since March 1, 1913, and payable to its shareholders, whether in cash or in stock of the corporation, joint-stock company, association, or insurance company, which stock dividend shall be considered income, to the amount of the earnings or profits so distributed: Provided further, That any distribution made to the shareholders of a corporation, joint-stock company, or association, or insurance company, in the year 1917, or subsequent tax years, shall be deemed to have been made from the net income of the year in which such distribution is made or, if such income is insufficient, from the most recently accumulated undivided profits or surplus, and shall constitute a part of the annual income of the shareholder for the respective years in which earned by the corporation, joint-stock company, association, or insurance company, and shall be taxed to the shareholder at the rate prescribed by law for such years."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the committee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, is this the provision to which I understood the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] was going to offer an amendment?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; this is not that provision at all.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I saw something in the paragraph in regard to undistributed surplus, and I presumed it was the provision referred to by the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. SIMMONS. This is not the provision at all. I will inquire where the Secretary stopped reading?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary stopped the reading with section 1200.

Mr. SIMMONS. There is very little change, I will say to the Senator, in that section. Down to line 14, on page 100, it is identically the same as the present law. This is a provision simply to amend the present income-tax law. In line 14 the words "earnings or profits so distributed" are inserted in place of the words "of its cash value," which were stricken out. The remainder of that provision is new, but it does not relate to the matter discussed by the Senator from New Mexico.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The SECRETARY. On page 101, after line 2, it is proposed to insert:

SEC. 1201. (1) That paragraphs 2 and 3 of subdivision (a) of section 5 of such act of September 8, 1916, are hereby amended to read as follows:

"Second. All interest paid within the year on his indebtedness except on indebtedness incurred for the purchase of obligations or securities the interest upon which is exempt from taxation as income under this title;

"Third. Taxes paid within the year imposed by the authority of the United States (except income and war-profits taxes) or of its Territories, or possessions, or any foreign country, or by the authority of any State, county, school district, or municipality, or other taxing subdivision of any State, not including those assessed against local benefits";

(2) Subdivision (c) of section 5 of such act of September 8, 1916, is hereby repealed.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] desires to be heard upon that particular paragraph, and I will ask that it go over. I will request the Secretary now to suspend the reading, as I am advised that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] desires to address the Senate.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I had not intended to address myself to this bill until the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] had made his speech in support of the views of the minority submitted by him. I am heartily in favor of the suggestions in the minority views submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. I wish at this time to make some general remarks indicating what my attitude is upon the bill and the amendments.

Mr. President, there is but one way for a nation to wage war with the greatest efficiency. It must pool its resources like one great family having a single larder and a common purse. Everything in the country, wherever found and however situated, must be appurtenant to the common undertaking. Deep in our hearts we know this. Why not face it man fashion?

We need millions of men. We must take them impartially from city, hamlet, and mountainside, from lonely huts, from loving arms; we must train them into soldiers who will not hesitate to take an enemy life by rifle shot or bayonet thrust; we must take them relentlessly, no matter who they are, no matter whose tears are shed. If some of them perchance prove cowards, they must die a coward's death, lest the contagion of a yellow heart spread throughout the ranks.

For war is a grim business. The nation that is not determined to see that grim business through in a grim way must be content to tread softly, and swallow insult and injury with a pleasant smile.

But we need more than men. We need billions of dollars. These also we must draft resolutely, impartially, relentlessly, no matter whose dollars they are, no matter how lovingly their owner clings to them. We must take them wherever we find them, preferably in large quantities at a time, and we must turn them to the common good. Every dollar in the country is now impressed with the Nation's brand. There are no mavericks.

So far we have gone without substantial dissent. But now a voice rings out, the voice of one who sleeps each night with head pillowed on the Constitution of the United States, to dream of stocks and bonds safely stowed in a safety vault. And his voice is heard to say, "You are preaching rank socialism."

It may be so. We can not be particular about the name. But there must be no mistake about the idea. War is a socialistic undertaking, waged on socialistic lines, each for all, all for each. If any man has anything the Nation needs, he must give it ungrudgingly, asking merely that all of a class be treated alike, and if more than his due shall be taken from him, compensation be awarded to balance the scales.

But let us for the moment take our conservative lover of the Constitution at his word. Let us assume that we are dealing with a purely socialistic State, where everything is owned in common. Let us see how the financial end will work out.

To begin with, in a socialistic State no one would expect to draw more from the common store during a serious war than would be fairly needed to maintain him in good health and in efficient condition. The common defense and general welfare would be the first consideration. The public treasury would be kept fully supplied. If error there be, it must be on the side of safety. Then if a surplus be left at the end of the war, there can be an extra dividend. Nothing has been lost. There has been merely a postponement of enjoyment.

If our socialistic State could not obtain materials from abroad with which to fight the war, its resources would be limited to supplies on hand and current production. It would speed up production; it would enforce economy; it would put every man to work; it would devote nothing to an unproductive use.

Since the State would own everything, it would incur no debt. It would not pretend to borrow from the future. It would produce as fast as it expended its supplies. It could expend no faster than it could produce. We should hear nothing of shifting the burden to succeeding generations.

At the close of the war, it is true, the country might be impoverished. Live stock might be scanty. Fences and buildings might be out of repair. Machinery might be worn out. Supplies of all kinds might be low. These deficiencies must be made good. Everyone would have to do his part to make them good. But there would be no public debt. Every man would have played his proper part. The common property would have been expended for the common good. What was left would belong to all alike. No one would hold any obligations of the Government which would entitle him to exact from others a portion of what they should produce in the years to come.

It is clear, then, that our socialistic state has paid for the war as it has gone along, out of what it had on hand at the outset and what it produced from month to month. It is also clear that it could not borrow from the future if it would. It could not expend a thing in the prosecution of the war until that thing had been produced.

If, now, we should truly govern the United States during the present war on terms of absolute equality—each for all and all for each—we should have no increase in our public debt at the close of the war. So far as soldiers are concerned we have started on a purely socialistic basis. We have taken those men of whom we have had most need. If we should also take such property as we need in the form of taxes, we should wage war as efficiently as possible and leave no legacy to posterity in the shape of an enormous amount of war bonds. It is easy to demonstrate this.

Let us fully realize at the outset that our resources in this war are strictly limited to supplies on hand and current production. We can not get anything from abroad in any substantial amount. We must produce all the food, clothing, supplies, munitions, and ships that we use in the war. We can not borrow a bushel of wheat, a khaki uniform, a rifle, or a submarine from the next generation. Our expenditures are absolutely limited to what we have now on hand and what we produce while the war lasts.

If we should take all these supplies, if we should commandeer them without compensation, we should clearly have no increase in our public debt at the close of the war. Our citizens would produce the supplies, our country would expend them, and we should be in the position of a father who has eaten the berries that his children have gathered.

If we should take the entire product of all citizens we should perform the part of the socialistic state, and we should compensate no one. But the product of our country is so vast that we do not need the entire output to prosecute the war. We have a large surplus left to enjoy as we go along.

Recognizing the right of the citizen whose product we take to be compensated out of the public purse, we can, nevertheless, properly take from people in general sufficient taxes for that purpose. Bearing in mind the analogy of our socialistic state, we realize that everything we use in the prosecution of the war is taken from goods on hand or from current production, and by making proper adjustments, through taxation, it may be paid for out of that part of current production which is not expended for war purposes.

This entirely practicable method of paying in full the expense of the war as we go along is very plain in the case of the socialistic state, but it is somewhat complicated and obscured by our system of private ownership, currency, and taxes. It is further obscured by the use of credits, which usually appear in times of war in the shape of Government bonds.

For the sake of clearness, let us imagine a township, which has spent all the money in the town treasury and is suddenly visited with a cloudburst which washes away roads and bridges. The citizens are not content to wait until the next year's taxes are available. They want the roads and bridges restored without delay. Labor and teams must be procured, food must be furnished to maintain them, and materials must be obtained. If these things were not already in existence as the result of past endeavor, there would be no way to make immediate repairs.

The town officials might persuade the men who have these things to supply them and wait for payment until the next year's taxes are at hand. But the usual way is to borrow money on a town note from a local bank or citizen, pay cash for labor, teams, and materials, and pay the note when the taxes are available. The point to observe is that the labor, teams, and materials are not produced the next year but are already in existence for immediate use. If they had been commandeered by the town without payment the community would have been no richer and no poorer. The burden would have fallen on those alone who had the needful materials. Through the medium of the note and future taxes the burden was merely shifted from those who had the materials to the community in general. By renewing the note or paying it in installments the burden may be distributed over a series of years and eventually paid in full by those who pay the taxes.

In precisely the same way all undertakings are limited by the amount of labor and materials which are on hand at a given time. War itself is so limited. The amount of munitions is controlled by the amount of materials on hand just as surely as the number of soldiers is controlled by the supply of men of military age and efficiency. It is a matter of time to produce more.

The part that money plays in waging war is to pass the title of necessary materials from private owners to the Government. Unless the materials are at hand no amount of money can procure them. When the private owner yields his property to the Government for money he must purchase with that money labor and other materials in order to produce more supplies to sell to the Government in the future.

When the Government has spent what funds are in the Treasury—the proceeds of past taxes—it must wait for additional tax proceeds or borrow just as the town borrowed to restore its roads and bridges. It may therefore sell bonds. With the proceeds it may buy more materials to expend for war purposes. And so it may go on raising money from taxes and loans and buying materials and paying soldiers until the war ends.

But let us remember that taxes produce no materials, that bonds produce no materials. They merely furnish cash, which is a means, a tool, or instrumentality, through which the ownership of materials is passed from a private possessor to the Government.

Cash, then, is a medium through which the ownership of goods is acquired. Bonds are credits or promises to deliver cash at some time in the future. Bonds are sometimes accepted in lieu of cash in exchange for goods. The proceeds of taxes and the proceeds of bonds are nothing but purchasing power in the hands of the Government. They create no materials. They merely serve as legal compensation to private owners when materials are taken for public use from private owners.

But there is a very vital difference between taxes and bonds. Taxes bring to the Government purchasing power without incurring liability for repayment. Bonds bring such purchasing power with an obligation to return a like amount of purchasing power with interest.

When taxes come into the Treasury the country is no richer, it possesses no more materials than before. But the Treasury is enriched, the Government is enriched, while taxpayers are just so much poorer. The payment of taxes is an actual transfer of wealth from private persons to the public representative.

But when proceeds of bonds come into the Treasury the Government is no richer and those who pay the money over are no poorer. The Government has, it is true, added purchasing power, but this asset is exactly offset by a liability to pay the same amount back in the future.

A tax transaction is, therefore, actually profitable to the Government. It is a legal method of taking property from citizens without compensation. A bond transaction, on the contrary, is in no sense profitable to the Government. It merely gives immediate purchasing power. As a business transaction it may be necessary, but it is usually very expensive.

This is clearly perceived when we reflect that the proceeds of bonds are expended for materials at war prices, while the payment for bonds is provided by taxes at peace prices. For example, a part of the proceeds of liberty bonds are spent for steel at a price two or three times above normal. The Government gets 20 or 30 pounds of steel for each dollar expended. When the bonds are paid, 15 or 20 years hence, steel will probably be back at normal prices, and the man who cashes in his bond can buy for each dollar 45 or 50 pounds of steel.

Moreover, taxes in peace times exact from the citizen a certain percentage, varying from year to year, of what he produces. The tax proceeds are used in part to pay current expenses, in part to pay the public debt. While the citizen pays in cash he in effect transfers to the Government so many pairs of shoes, so many tons of steel, so many bushels of wheat, and so on. With prices restored to a peace basis each pair of shoes, each ton of steel, and each load of wheat will discharge fewer dollars of debt than they would at war prices. Consequently it takes the citizen more years to discharge the debt than it would if high prices were maintained. Thus we find that the dollars borrowed in war times produce a small amount of materials, while it takes large amounts of the same materials in peace times to discharge the debt. The citizen, through his Government, borrows for public use in war times at a great disadvantage, and he pays his loan in peace times at a great disadvantage.

We can see, too, that the bond method shifts the burden from the man who can best afford to pay, to the man who can least afford to pay. In war times those who profit by war contracts have enormous incomes from which to pay taxes, and corporations of the same class have billions of war profits, which everyone concedes are a proper subject for taxation. If we pay as we go through current taxes we can get most of our revenue from these sources.

But in peace times war profits and war incomes have disappeared, and our tax system has returned to normal. Most of our revenue is thus raised from the tariff and internal revenue, taxes on the average man, on the consumer. By postponing our taxation we permit the man who ought to pay the tax to escape it, leaving the average citizen to stop the gap.

Then, again, the issue of vast quantities of bonds increases the amount of credits in the money market and causes inflation, and even higher prices. With successive issues the rate of interest is likely to increase. The time may come when no more bonds can be sold at any price within reason.

The advantages of taxation over bond issues are thus seen to be so obvious that the objections to paying the major part of war expenses by taxation must be very strong indeed if they are to prevail. Some of these objections will not appeal to the Senate; others must be seriously considered.

The real objection to taxation instead of bond issues, the underlying motive for the fine-spun excuses that are put forward, rests upon the self-interest of those who have funds. These capitalists prefer to loan their money to the Government rather than have the Government take it in the form of taxes. In the first case they get their money back when its purchasing power is greatly augmented. In the second case they yield it to the Government without getting any direct return of any part. We should naturally expect to find capitalists, their friends, agents, and political satellites producing a large bunch of specious reasons to prove that heavy taxation is unwise and advocating a heavy issue of bonds. It is from these bond advocates that we get the suggestion about "passing a part of the burden to the next generation."

The principal reason advanced in favor of raising two billions of revenue instead of three billions under this bill is the danger of causing injury to business. This argument has a familiar sound. It is a stock argument of the standpatter, the man who finds things to his liking and fears to lose his advantage if a change is made. He usually has a quiver full of epithets to launch at the luckless reformer who dares to suggest a change. We heard them all when we had under consideration the tariff bill, the income tax, the Federal reserve act, the shipping bill, and other progressive measures of the past four years. And we heard the prophecies of disaster and calamity that would surely follow their enactment. Needless to say, these direful prophecies have not come true. They will not in this case, as we may easily demonstrate.

In the first place, business can not be bad, or even mildly prosperous, when the Government is spending billions for supplies of all sorts at war prices. Business can do nothing but boom under such conditions.

Imagine, if you can, any American business man refusing to rush his plant at capacity because the Government is going to take a full half of his income, and a full half of the war profits of his corporation in order to help him pay high prices for what he produces. The suggestion is absurd.

I have talked with many business men about the best way to raise revenue in the present emergency. What they fear is a direct tax on their gross sales or on their production so that they may be driven out of business. A tax on automobile manufacturers, for example, would probably close many small factories altogether. A tax on express companies may compel them to stop serving the public.

But if a man is allowed to keep his business going during the war, retain his trade relations with his customers and those who furnish his machinery and materials, hold his office and working force intact, and make enough income to support his family comfortably he will not complain. With the very life of the Nation at stake, with soldiers and their families making sacrifices on every hand, no one can fairly demand more than enough to keep himself and his dependents in good health and efficient condition.

When, however, we permit a corporation to make a normal profit and on top of that retain one-half of its war profit, when we permit every man to keep at least half of his income, imposing a low tax on small incomes, it is ridiculous to say that American business men will lie down in the harness. No one believes it.

So far as war profits are concerned, no man ought to be allowed to retain even one-half. Whatever a man makes out of the war should be treated as a trust fund for the good of the Nation. I would permit war profits to be made for the sake of getting large accumulations of funds where we can readily lay our hands on them. I would consider those who amass huge profits out of the misfortunes of the Nation due to the war as mere collection agencies for the Government and permit them to retain, as a commission for collecting, a reasonable fee of 10 or 20 per cent. I would then thank them for their trouble and relieve them of the remaining 80 or 90 per cent.

England imposes a tax of 80 per cent on war profits. Last year she collected 60 per cent and the year before that 50 per cent. From her experience we learn that the levy of a large war-profits tax does not affect business at all unfavorably. On the contrary, business in England has never been so good as it is now.

England is not so rich a country as ours. Incomes are not so large. Profits are not so large. But England is taxing her citizens this year at the rate of $61 per head. The same per capita tax in the United States would produce over six billions. But the total revenues of this country, if the bill reported by the committee becomes a law, will be only three and one-third billions. We ought to raise twice this amount by taxation.

According to the majority report, the estimated expenditures for the fiscal year are five thousand six hundred millions. But additional estimates of five billions have been received from the Secretary of the Treasury, so that the total estimates of expenditures to July 1, 1918, are over ten billions seven hundred millions. We have already appropriated three billions for loans to our allies, and the Secretary now tells us that four billions more will be needed for that purpose this year. This makes the grand total to be raised for this year nearly eighteen billions.

The estimated revenue for this fiscal year under existing laws is $1,333,500,000; and to this amount the committee proposes to add two billions under the pending bill, a total of three and one-third billions out of eighteen billions appropriations. The prospect of attempting to raise from bonds in a single year the sum of fourteen and two-thirds billions of dollars is appalling.

Our war profits for 1916 were over three billions, and for 1917 they are estimated to be four billions. A levy of a flat 50 per cent tax should be made on these war profits, yielding two billions of dollars.

I believe that the income tax should be largely increased over the committee bill, not making a higher maximum rate but imposing higher rates on the larger incomes above $15,000. The additional income tax to be raised under this bill might easily be increased to a billion without inflicting undue burdens on anyone. But even under the committee bill the estimated additional tax is seven hundred and seventy-seven millions.

The additional tax on wines and spirits under the committee bill is two hundred and seven millions, and on tobacco and its products fifty-six millions, making a total under these two heads of two hundred and sixty-three millions.

It thus appears that over three billions can be readily raised from a flat tax of 50 per cent on war profits, an income tax not exceeding 50 per cent on the highest incomes, and the increased spirits and tobacco tax. These taxes would cause no hardship to anyone.

I am strongly opposed to the present imposition of all the other taxes recommended by the committee, such as the taxes on railroad freights and transportation, automobiles, coffee,, tea, cocoa, sugar, and postal facilities. It is argued that it is best to impose these taxes on consumption now and leave the higher rates on incomes and war profits to come later. But when we have fixed the rates on incomes and war profits in this bill business men will insist that they have adjusted their affairs in reliance on these rates, so that we are morally estopped to raise these rates during the fiscal year. It is for this reason better to postpone the consumption taxes to a time when they are inevitable.

Consumption taxes on tea, coffee, cocoa, and sugar are not defensible at this time. The great bulk of such taxes fall on poor people, who are already in desperate straits. While wages have advanced 25 or 30 per cent the cost of living has advanced 50 or 60 per cent, so that labor is getting much less in real wages than it was getting before the war.

Wages never advance as rapidly as the cost of living. The annual reports of the United States Steel Corporation for 1913 and 1916 present an interesting study of the share that the workingman gets from war profits. The 1916 net income for stockholders was two hundred and seventy-one millions. The total amount paid out in that year for salaries and wages to all employees, high and low, was two hundred and sixty-three millions, actually less than the earnings for stockholders. The net earnings in 1913 were eighty-one millions, and the amount paid for salaries and wages was two hundred and seven millions. That is, the stockholders' profits increased 233 per cent, while the salaries and wages of its employees increased only 26 per cent, or about one-tenth as much as net earnings. It is clear that profits of corporations should be taxed much higher than we now propose before the necessities of the workingman are levied upon.

I understand that there will be offered, as the different amendments come up, amendments that will seek to shape the bill somewhat along the lines of the minority report of the committee. I do not understand that a substitute bill will be offered by the minority if the amendments are adopted to the separate sections. I feel myself that 80 or 90 per cent of war profits might be fairly taken; but I believe that an effort to take more than 50 per cent, either from incomes or from war profits, would be considered in many quarters by very respectable and patriotic men as confiscatory. I should not myself regard this so much, but I feel that it is hopeless to try to get the Senate to agree to impose a tax higher than 50 per cent on any income of a corporation or of an individual. For that reason I feel that the practical limit for the war-profits tax is 50 per cent.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CALDER in the chair). Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I desire to ask the Senator if he will state definitely what would be the difference in the profits of the company after the 50 per cent tax shall be levied? What would be the difference to the stockholders between now and normal times?

Mr. HOLLIS. It depends entirely on how much the normal profit of the corporation was. For example, a corporation might have been making 50 per cent profit in normal times and this year it might make greatly in excess of the normal profit. My proposition would be to take 50 per cent of that excess; and I could not tell what difference it would make to the stockholder unless I knew what his normal dividend had been.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. In order to get the Senator's view, do I understand from the statement he has made now, that if the corporation had made 50 per cent during the prewar period and made in excess of that now, he would advise exempting the 50 per cent from the operation of this tax?

Mr. HOLLIS. I am very glad to hear the Senator's question and to answer it as it strikes me.

In the first place, whatever a corporation makes belongs to the stockholders; and if the earnings are distributed in the form of dividends we will get a chance to tax those earnings in the hands of the individual through the income tax. Now, there are thousands and hundreds of thousands, probably millions, of small stockholders in large corporations.

Whatever we take from the large corporation in the way of a tax will reduce the dividends of the small stockholder just as much as it reduces the dividend of the large stockholder. In that way a man with a few shares of stock in the Steel Corporation might lose half his income, whereas if we take the money, so far as incomes are concerned, from the individual we only take it from those who get an income in excess of the minimum.

Then, again, the proposition that I understand the Senator from Ohio favors and that has very much to be said for it, would exempt from all taxation 8 per cent of the earnings of the corporation on its capital stock. There are a great many corporations that have much water in them that do not earn over 8 per cent.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, with all due respect, that does not fairly represent my view.

Mr. HOLLIS. Then I shall be very glad to have the Senator's view, because I should like to reach an agreement with him on it.

Mr. POMERENE. I have never said that I believed in an exemption based upon capital stock. On the contrary, I do not believe in it. I believe rather in an exemption based upon the investment of actual capital. Now, we have got to define that in a certain way, and I appreciate the legislative difficulties when it comes to making that definition; but, with all due respect to those who differ from me, I do not think the difficulties we will meet in defining capital invested, and afterward in administering the law, will be in excess of the difficulties which we will meet under the present form of the bill.

I think that fairly states my position with respect to the exemption.

While I am on my feet let me say that the Senator has sought to defend his position with reference to exempting earnings of 50 per cent of a corporation now, if it earned 50 per cent during the prewar period, by stating that this belongs to the stockholders, and when it is distributed to the stockholders it will then be subject to the tax. That is true if it is distributed; but, to take a concrete case, I understand that until a short time ago, for instance, the Bethlehem Steel Co. neither declared nor paid dividends, but its stock went from a very nominal valuation up to six or seven or eight or nine hundred dollars per share. There were enormous earnings all the while; and yet, under the Senator's theory, notwithstanding the fact that there were these enormous earnings during the years 1911, 1912, and 1913, earnings during the current year equal to the average earnings during 1911, 1912, and 1913 would not be subject to this tax. Yet the Government gets nothing from that, because the earnings of the corporation during the prewar period have not been distributed in the form of dividends, so that the Government gets no revenue from it at all.

I do not believe in retroactive legislation as bearing upon this subject; but if a corporation has been making $1,000,000 per year during the years 1911, 1912, and 1913, and makes $1,000,000 during the current year, in all good conscience I do not see any reason why that $1,000,000 should not contribute its share toward the maintenance of the Government during this trying period of our history.

Mr. HOLLIS. I agree with the Senator almost completely. When the Senator is ready with the plan that he advocates in order to effect the object he wishes to effect, I shall examine it with the greatest of interest, and I expect to be able to go with the Senator. At present I have not seen any plan that is satisfactory to me.

We must not forget that the war-profits tax is a war-profits tax. It is what a man makes because there is a war. The other tax is just an income tax, entirely comparable or almost comparable to the income of the individual. Now, in peace times I was not at all satisfied with the amount that was levied on incomes, either of individuals or of corporations. Now, that we are at war, and there is stress, I think that should be increased very largely, and I entirely sympathize with the Senator on that; but if he will work out the plan of exempting an income of 8 per cent to a corporation, he will find that a very large number of the railroad corporations of this country will escape altogether, because they do not earn as much as 8 per cent. Under the war-profits tax, if they average 4 per cent in the prewar period and made 8 per cent during the war period, we would get 50 per cent of the excess.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLLIS. I am very glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. I would not interrupt the Senator——

Mr. HOLLIS. I am very glad to have the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. But the Senator has referred specifically to railroad corporations. Now, I recognize the fact that when we speak of public-utility corporations, and so on, and so forth, it at once becomes a bone of contention. I do not believe in allowing railroad companies or any other kind of public-utility corporations to earn excessive profits; but in my judgment the Senator himself has furnished the answer to the objection he is making now to my proposition. If he will allow me to explain, I will take a moment of time to explain.

Mr. HOLLIS. I shall be delighted to have the solution, whether it comes from me or from anyone else.

Mr. POMERENE. It does seem to me we ought not to have very much difficulty in getting together on this proposition. When I made the statement a moment ago that if a corporation had a prewar profit of $1,000,000 and now had a profit of a million during the current year the Senator's answer to that objection was this: The capital stock belongs to the stockholders.

Mr. HOLLIS. By way of illustrating the Senator's statement, it is taken out of the poor stockholders as well as the rich stockholders.

Mr. POMERENE. I appreciate that fully. Later on when it is distributed the Government gets it back on the income. But the Senator must agree with me that we must have large corporations, as large railroad corporations. They are a part of our industrial and our material life. They must be fostered as well as anything else.

Mr. HOLLIS. Right there, if the Senator will pardon me, I do not agree that they have a right to capitalize their earnings.

Mr. POMERENE. Not at all. I have not so said at all. They should be kept down by the reduction of freight rates, if necessary, so that there can be a fair return upon their investment.

Mr. HOLLIS. If the Senator will pardon me, he does not catch my point at all. They should be strong and prosperous and build good roads and have good facilities of every kind.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator and I do not differ on that proposition, but what I am saying is that the stockholders in that corporation have a right to a reasonable return. It may be in the Senator's mind 6 per cent, in another Senator's mind it may be 7 per cent, in another Senator's mind it may be 8 per cent, but we ought to agree upon some recompense to which the stockholder is entitled for the investment he has made. If there is a $10,000,000 corporation, and the earnings are only 6 per cent, though that amounts to an enormous sum, taken as a whole, that is no reason why there should be a tax upon that corporation.

Mr. HOLLIS. But it is.

Mr. POMERENE. But if they have earnings over and above what is a reasonable return, if it is 6 per cent, then it ought to be taxed, unquestionably.

Mr. HOLLIS. The whole basis of the war-profits tax is that they are getting more out of the war than they got in peace times. I do not care whether the corporation was only making 2 per cent in peace times three years before the war and is only making 3 per cent now, if it is making 3 per cent now it is making 1 per cent out of the war, and I want them to contribute half of it to the support of the war. That is the theory of war-profit taxes. When the Senator undertakes to tax the corporation that always made large earnings I am with him if he can find some way to do it that will be satisfactory, and I am therefore in favor of the Jones amendment, which will compel the surplus to be declared in the form of dividends. I think that will satisfactorily reach it.

Mr. POMERENE. There are many things about the Senate committee bill that I like, and I prefer it above many of the provisions in the House bill. I wish that there could be some arrangement made which would look to a just and definite exemption; but under this proposition as it is now if one corporation earned during the prewar period 100 per cent on its capital stock during each of the years 1911, 1912, and 1913, and during the current year earns 100 per cent on that same capital stock, it is exempt from the payment of this war tax.

Mr. HOLLIS. It should be, should it not?

Mr. POMERENE. By no means, in my judgment.

Mr. HOLLIS. Then do not call it war-profits tax. Call it something else.

Mr. POMERENE. When we get a definition that is a practical definition of war profits, then I think the Senator and I can agree.

Mr. HOLLIS. The Senator will permit me to give him the definition.

Mr. POMERENE. Let me go on a little further.

Mr. HOLLIS. If the Senator does not want it I can not give it to him.

Mr. POMERENE. I want it, but I have not finished my suggestion. Take another proposition. We have another corporation that during the years 1911, 1912, and 1913 has made on an average 10 per cent per annum on its capital stock. That is a normal profit. It goes on and it has something of these so-called war profits, and this year it amounts, we will say, to 15 per cent. So we have this anomalous situation, that a corporation which makes this year 15 per cent on its capital stock is taxed under the bill only 5 per cent and another corporation that makes this year 100 per cent escapes. If there is enough genius anywhere to make an explanation that will satisfy the public, I should like to have that explanation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLLIS. First I should like to reply to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I would be very glad to be satisfied on that point.

Mr. HOLLIS. If we will agree to discuss war profits now we can come to an agreement very quickly on the rest of it. Assuming that a corporation made 10 per cent during ordinary years and this year it makes 5 per cent for the reason that the war has actually hurt its business, it does not pay any war profit. I do not know if we would try to do exact, equal justice but that we ought to contribute to that corporation just as we contribute to the family of a soldier because he has gone to fight the battles. That is the theory of war profits. A war profit is everything that a man or corporation makes in excess of what he would make if we were at peace.

Mr. POMERENE. If I may interpolate, that is a part of the theory of war tax that does not appear in this bill, and I would not want it to appear.

Mr. HOLLIS. I should like to ask the Senator how he would reach a corporation that made 100 per cent for three years before the war started and makes 100 per cent this year?

Mr. POMERENE. It would not be war profits.

Mr. HOLLIS. Do not call it war profits. Call it something else.

Mr. POMERENE. That is all right. I think the Senator has asked a question which can be fairly answered, and, in my judgment, it comes more nearly solving this problem than the method which is presented.

Mr. HOLLIS. Let me ask the Senator further, Would he suggest it as a substitute for the war tax?

Mr. POMERENE. I will explain it as I go along. I want to make a preliminary remark. My belief is that if any business concern goes through this war and makes on its investment a given per cent, a net profit—it may be 6 per cent, it may be 8 per cent, and in the minds of some it may be 10 per cent—it ought not to hesitate about contributing a very large part of what it earns over and above that for the common defense. So, in my judgment, if we were to adopt some provision here whereby we would say that we will exempt from the so-called war tax this certain per cent on the actual capital invested, and that must be defined—and there are serious difficulties there—you will come more nearly solving this question than by the plan that is proposed.

Mr. HOLLIS. The Senator's idea is to substitute something for war-profits taxes.

Mr. POMERENE. No; something for the exemption. I believe in this graduated tax on the higher earnings. It may be that that plan, so far as the graduated portion of the tax is concerned, in the Senate committee bill is the best that can be devised. I have not studied that carefully, but I would substitute something like the exemption of 6 or 8 or 10 per cent from the profits, whatever they are, instead of a so-called normal tax.

Let me suggest a class of cases. We talk about war profits, and when it comes to war profits as applied to a munition maker or as applied to a steel company, as applied to a copper company, we have a pretty definite notion as to what war profits are, because the rise in prices in the product of each of those companies is very largely, if not altogether, due to the fact that we have a war. But, on the other hand, suppose we take up by way of illustration a company that is manufacturing agricultural implements. We know that the price of the raw material for which they have to pay has been very largely increased. But suppose there is a given profit or net earning over and above the expenses of, say, 10 per cent; I have not seen anybody yet who has told me that he is going to be wise enough to determine what portion of that profit is due to unusual business ability, what portion of it is due to war, what portion of it is due to a new market perhaps for their surplus product in agricultural implements, or what portion of it may be due to a hundred other causes.

Let me take another illustration. Suppose we have a concern that is manufacturing household goods, kitchen ware; it may be parlor furniture, bedroom furniture. The profit of that concern during the current year is 10 per cent. I care not whether the profit during the three years of the prewar period was 5 per cent or 15 per cent; can anyone tell the Senate what portion of that 10 per cent is war profit due to the war and what per cent is not? Yet if that concern during the prewar period made 10 per cent and during the present year made 15 per cent, 5 per cent of it would be taxable on the theory that it is war profits. It may be that it is due to better management; it may be that it is due to the fact that the purchasing agent of that company had more intelligent foresight—it may be accidental foresight—which enabled him to buy his raw material in anticipation of an advance and that alone is the cause of that increased profit. On the other hand, if he has not that foresight and has to pay an increased price, then the situation is different. But we call it all war profits. Profits for the purpose of taxation are a pretty difficult thing to classify, and if it can be classified it will help me to solve the difficulties that I now see.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HOLLIS. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. The proposition of the Senator from Ohio is nothing more nor less than that contained in the House bill, where the House fixes an arbitrary rate of 8 per cent and assesses all over and above that rate as excess profits. The House provided for an excess-profits tax, whereas the Finance Committee of the Senate has provided for a war tax.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh——

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment. I want to say to the Senator there is no part of the bill that was considered so carefully and so long as this very tax. It would develop, I will say to the Senator from Ohio, if his proposition was put into law and the arbitrary rate of 8 per cent was established, as he suggested, that there would not be many railroads in the United States which would pay a cent of taxes; the United States Steel Co. would not pay one-third of what they pay under the Senate committee provision.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, with all due respect to the Senator, that is impossible.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator, if he will just take 10 minutes with me, I will show him the statements of the concerns that I speak of, and if I can not convince him it is true I shall not say another word on the floor of the Senate about this provision. Now, is not that a fair proposition?

Mr. POMERENE. I will give the Senator 10 hours to explain it.

Mr. SMOOT. But what I said happens to be true.

Mr. POMERENE. It does not happen to be true for this reason: You grant a certain exemption. I have not said it should be 8 per cent. I do not know what it should be.

Mr. SMOOT. The House bill did that.

Mr. POMERENE. Very well, I have not approved the House bill. The Senate committee bill raises more revenue than the House bill does on this subject. I think I am right in that.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; the Senator is right.

Mr. POMERENE. In that respect I am in perfect accord with the Senate committee. But the committee has not yet presented any figures to show to me—and I have asked for them, but I have not yet been able to get them—if there is 6 per cent exemption that ought to exempt a given number of millions of dollars. If you are exempting the normal war tax as defined in the Senate committee bill, nobody has yet told me how many millions of dollars will be exempt, and I am a little in the dark as to that. But if some exemption is adopted here, I do not care what you call it—something that is going to be fair and equitable and just—and then you can raise this graduated tax on the higher earnings, I will join hands, because if I have one criticism to make of the graduations which have been adopted here it is that there is not more money raised from the so-called war profits than the Senate committee has raised. But the mistake the committee has made is basic, in my judgment, because it is going to exempt very much of the profits of the very prosperous corporations that ought not to be exempted. I wish I could see my way clear, because my desire is to accept the committee's report. I wish I could see my way clear to set the seal of approval on my own conscience on a bill which exempts a profit of 100 per cent in one corporation because it earned that during the prewar period and taxes 5 per cent of the profits of another corporation because that corporation only earned 10 per cent before the war.

Mr. SMOOT. I know it was unfair for me to interject my statement into the speech of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HOLLIS. I think it is very illuminating. I am glad the Senator did it.

Mr. POMERENE. I must apologize to the Senator from New Hampshire. I did not mean to take so much of his time.

Mr. HOLLIS. No apology is necessary. I am learning a lot of things.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio says the committee has not given any figures to exemplify the conditions as I have just stated them to be, particularly in relation to the railroads and the United States Steel Corporation. If the Senator will take the speech made by the chairman of the Committee on Finance [Mr. SIMMONS], he will ascertain exactly what I said to be the case. In other words, I want to call the attention of the Senator——

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, Mr. President, I am not doubting that; I did not have that fact in mind; but it is quite true that if we adopt a straight 6 per cent exemption it is going to relieve from the payment of these taxes many corporations whose earnings have been 2 per cent or 3 per cent, or which, perhaps, have had a balance on the wrong side of the ledger. It will exempt all of them, probably.

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator is wrong. The bill as we reported it to the Senate provided for all subnormal cases. I desire to say to the Senator, allow the United States Steel Corporation a flat 8 per cent exemption, if you please; then, I say, under the House bill, which provides for an 8 per cent exemption, the United States Steel Corporation would pay only about a third of what it would pay under the provisions of the bill as reported by the Senate committee.

Mr. POMERENE rose.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, I will show the Senator why that is true.

Mr. POMERENE. Let me say that I have not at any time stated that I favored the provision of the House bill.

Mr. SMOOT. No; but the Senator is suggesting the very same thing now.

Mr. POMERENE. No; I am not. I am suggesting the same form of exemption. I am not defending the form of the graduated tax, but I prefer the form as to that feature provided in the bill as reported by the Senate committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the committee gave just as much attention to the question of the administration of the law under a flat exemption as they did as to what the rate should be. The committee ascertained that if they provided for a flat exemption or if the exemption were based upon the capital stock and bonds of the committee, or upon the capital stock only, or upon the actual value, as suggested by the Senator from Ohio, then it would involve the question of the physical valuation, the actual cash valuation of all the property of the corporations of the country; and this war will be over long before that could be accomplished.

I wish the Senator from Ohio would take these things into consideration, and when the reasons for the committee imposing not only the rates they have but adopting the system which they have are explained, I trust he and other Senators will be in their seats to listen. I know, Mr. President, that there are two sides to this question.

Mr. POMERENE. I am glad to hear the Senator from Utah admit that.

Mr. SMOOT. I had better admit, perhaps, that there are two sides to almost every question; but certainly there are to this question. I hope before we vote upon it that both sides may be presented to the Senate, and I should like very well to have them presented at a time when we have a full attendance in the Senate.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I recognize the difficulties of administration which have troubled everyone who has thought about the matter; there is no question that difficulties abound; but the Senator from Utah has just referred to an 8 per cent exemption under the excess-profits tax. Well, I think the department administered that law.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. They attempted to define what the actual cash capital invested was. I assume that they had some difficulty in doing that, but they did it.

Mr. SMOOT. And upon the basis——

Mr. POMERENE. I know, and I have not any doubt that there were serious mistakes made; but they were mistakes of administration. I recognize the fact that we must take into consideration the difficulties of administration when we are taking up the question of legislation; but whatever mistake was made in that behalf was one rather of administration than of legislation. Now, under the present situation, if this amendment is adopted, the Senator from Utah is going to help to write in the law itself a provision which is going to operate as an injustice. It seems to me that we are making a legislative mistake when we do that.

I am delighted to have the Senator's views on this subject and to exchange thoughts on it, and so forth, with the hope that we may ultimately get together. I want to agree to this report if I can, and I hope and pray that the committee, like Saul of Tarsus, may see a new light on the way to Damascus before we reach a vote.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask pardon of the Senator from New Hampshire, and I am not going to say anything more at present.

Mr. HOLLIS. I am very glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I am only too glad, however, to tell the Senator from Ohio at least how I look at the bill. I could do it perhaps better at some other time, but I want to say just a word further.

Every estimate of revenue in this bill which has been given to the Senate, so far as I know—and certainly that is true as to the figures that I have given—is based upon the reports which have been made to the department as to the incomes of the corporations and individuals throughout the country since the year 1909. So it is true, as the Senator has said, that the department has administered the law so far as collecting the taxes is concerned. The statement that I made when I rose and asked to interrupt the Senator from New Hampshire was based upon the very investments which had been ascertained by the Treasury Department in collecting taxes from the corporations of which I speak.

In relation to the other matter to which the Senator referred, I merely wish to say that the committee had in view the collecting of revenue from war profits. So far as I am personally concerned, I thought the proper thing to do, if a man made a thousand dollars war profit, was to impose a flat tax rate upon it, and if he made $10,000,000 he ought to pay the same rate, because the profits would all be war profits, and they ought to be taxed at the same rate.

So far as I am concerned, however, Mr. President, I have accepted and shall accept the rates of taxation which are imposed by the bill on a graduated scale. In doing so we shall collect in volume of money more from these great corporations of the country than it would be possible to collect in any other way. The Senator and I may disagree as to the graduated taxes to be imposed—that is a question which we can discuss later—whether the taxes imposed in the bill as reported by the committee are too low or too high.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield further?

Mr. HOLLIS. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. I simply want to make a closing observation and to present a new illustration, if I can do so. Suppose that an individual during the prewar period made on an average a million dollars in bucket-shop operations and that he makes another million dollars during the current year in bucket-shop operations?

Mr. HOLLIS. They do not call them bucket-shop operations when a man makes as much as that.

Mr. SMOOT. That would be called high finance.

Mr. POMERENE. I myself do not know very much about that kind of business; but under the theory of this bill that man would not pay any tax on his million dollars' profit. On the other hand, however, if another man was selling Bibles and during each of the three years 1911, 1912, and 1913 made $10,000 a year, and during the current year made $15,000, under this bill the Senate Committee on Finance would call that $5,000 which he made out of Bibles war profits, and he would be taxed on that $5,000, while the man who made a million dollars in bucketshop gambling would not pay one penny. I wish somebody could so explain that rule to me that I could understand it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota, who has been trying to get in for some time.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator says the man who made enormous profits in bucket-shop operations would not pay a cent. Would he not pay about 44 per cent income tax?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I submit to my very good friend from North Dakota that he would pay an income tax; of course, he would; so does everybody else pay an income tax; so does the man who pays the war-profits tax; they all pay the income tax; but we are speaking specifically now of the war-profits tax.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; but I want to suggest to the Senator that the language used by him would convey to the Senate the broader impression that the man referred to would pay no tax. Undoubtedly the Senator intended to convey the idea that he would pay no excess war-profits tax.

Mr. POMERENE. That is what I meant, and I am very glad that the Senator called attention to that fact, because I would not want any misstatement of it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to call the attention of the Senator to another fact. The Senator, I presume, would base the war-profits tax upon the capital employed. If the Senator making the suggestion and criticizing the method adopted by the committee will at some time sit down, write out, and offer to this bill an amendment which will levy the tax equitably upon any basis of capital stock or capital employed during this year or during the war, I am positively certain that the Committee on Finance will immediately call a meeting and will revise what they have done.

Mr. POMERENE. Well, now, Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission has been laboring for five years to secure a physical valuation of the railways of the country, and they have not even got started in that work as yet. A basis of taxation requiring the physical valuation of the corporate assets of the institutions engaged in business in the United States would require such a length of time to be determined that it would be impossible to employ it. Therefore the committee thought it best, in answer to the general appeal throughout the country that we should impose a tax on war profits, to determine in some way what are war profits, and the only way to determine what the real war profits are is by determining what any institution made prior to the war for a reasonable length of time and then determine what those same concerns have made since. Subtracting the first earnings from the second earnings will give approximately the war profits or at least such profits as have been made since the war. We labored earnestly to find a better method, but that is the only method we have been able to adopt as a basis of taxation of war profits of corporations. There is no——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment—there is no question that the other method would be far better, provided we had some way of determining the capital invested in business, but there is no way of ascertaining that fact which, in the opinion of the committee, would be satisfactory.

Mr. POMERENE. Now, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield further?

Mr. HOLLIS. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. I recognize the difficulties that confronted the committee, and I do not mean by anything that I have said to question their sincerity of purpose. I know they have all been entirely faithful and I know they have had a giant's task. I think, despite the illustration given by my friend, the Senator from North Dakota, of the railroads and the difficulty of making a physical valuation of their property—and I recognize there is some difficulty in connection with that undertaking—that the obstacle is not insurmountable. It is not necessary that there be an exact valuation to the penny, or anything of that kind. There is a way of getting at these things based upon stock valuation, the market value of stock, and many other side lights that are obtainable. I think they could be fairly taken into consideration, although I recognize the fact that they are not always safe guides.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I say to the Senator that we did consider that, and investigated and applied it, but found that it would not work equitably.

Mr. POMERENE. The fact that the committee has investigated it—and I have no doubt of that fact—demonstrates entirely to my mind that they are not at all satisfied with the plan they have proposed. I have not any doubt that they believed that was the best plan under all the circumstances; but to my mind it is a question which is going to operate so as to bring about a more nearly perfect degree of justice. In my judgment, the plan of exemption along the line I have indicated would satisfy the country better than the other plan. I hope I may be wrong and I hope that that can be demonstrated; but I have not been able to see the demonstration as yet.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. We will never get anywhere with this question by taking imaginary cases; we have got to take actual cases; we have got to take actual situations.

The Senator from Ohio indicates that he would prefer an exemption based upon the percentage earned on invested capital. There is a manifest infirmity in that method of ascertaining prewar profits.

Suppose you were to take 8 per cent as the basis. That is the House basis. Is it not clear to the Senator that a concern or an industry actually earning during the prewar period only 4 per cent would be allowed as an exemption twice as much as they actually earned, and therefore they would have to make during the war period a profit of 100 per cent more than they made during the prewar period before they would have to pay any tax at all?

That is the identical case with the railroads. The railroads were making, during the years 1911, 1912, and 1913, 4½ per cent. I mean, that was the average that they were making, taking all the roads of the United States. Now, if you were to allow them an exemption of 8 per cent, that would be nearly twice as much as their actual earnings; so that the railroads would have to make a profit of 100 per cent more since the war than they were making before the war before they would have to pay a dollar of this tax.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, of course I see the Senator's theory.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is one side of it. Now let me present the other side.

Mr. POMERENE. Very well.

Mr. SIMMONS. Suppose, on the other hand, that we take the industries of the country, and we find that they were making on an average during the prewar years 16 per cent. They would be entitled under this arbitrary rule to only an 8 per cent exemption, or to an exemption equal to only one-half as much as they were making before the war; so that if, since the war, they should make exactly the same as they made before the war, they would have to pay a very heavy tax. They would have to pay at the rate of 100 per cent, the 100 per cent rate in our graduated scale.

Suppose they were making 16 before the war and make 12 per cent after the war, and were allowed only an 8 per cent exemption. They would have to pay a tax upon 4 per cent, which would mean that a concern that was making 16 per cent before the war, and was making only 12 after the war—4 per cent less upon its investment than it was making before the war—would have to pay an excess-profits tax on this part of its earnings. In other words, its 12 per cent earnings after the war would be regarded as an excess in earnings over its 16 per cent earnings before the war.

So that the Senator can see, taking either side of that question—either the case of the man who was making less than 8 per cent, or the case of the man who was making more than 8 per cent—that a rank injustice would be done in the one case, and a rank favoritism would be done in the other case.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I understand the Senator's theory about it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, is it not a fact? Can the Senator work it out in any other way?

Mr. POMERENE. I think so.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is an absolute fact. It is not a theory. That is what I say—that in this matter we want to deal with facts and not theories.

Mr. POMERENE. It is an absolute fact; but the Senator's logic reduces him to this position: He says that because the individual has $10,000, it may be, invested in railroad stocks——

Mr. SIMMONS. No.

Mr. POMERENE. Well, just wait until I am through. This is what it means when you thoroughly analyze it—that if he has $10,000 invested in railroad stocks, and that corporation during a certain period only earns 4 per cent or 4½ per cent; if that railroad company happens during this year to earn 6 per cent, that corporation shall be taxed only on the 1½ per cent, but if, on the other hand, he has $10,000 invested in another corporation that earned 100 per cent before the war, and that corporation earns 100 per cent during the current year, that corporation shall pay none of this tax. So that in the one instance you are penalizing the stockholder in the railroad company by taxing his so-called surplus earnings of 1½ per cent, though the earnings were only 6 per cent, and in the other instance, when it comes to the $10,000 that he has in the corporation that earns 100 per cent, you will not tax him anything, but you will allow that to be distributed by way of dividends, because it earned 100 per cent before the war and earns 100 per cent now.

I can not see the justice of it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have said nothing of the kind. I have said none of the things that the Senator attributed to me. All I have said is that if we adopt an arbitrary standard of 10 per cent or 8 per cent, and a concern subject to the tax was making less than that amount before the war, by virtue of giving it an exemption in excess of what it was making before the war, when it made after the war a very much larger profit, as high as 100 per cent, it would escape taxation altogether. I think that must be clear to everybody. I do not think anybody can deny that general proposition.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, there ought not to be any difference between the Senator from North Carolina and myself. I did not say he used the illustration that I did, but I said in substance that the principle for which he is contending would lead him to the conclusion of which I spoke.

Mr. SIMMONS. I had not reached the subject of the principle of the business at all. I was simply discussing the question of selecting an arbitrary standard for ascertaining the profits of the prewar period, and I was attempting to show that if a man was making less than that before the prewar period, it was a matter of favoritism to him to allow him a larger exemption than he was actually making. On the other hand, it would be unjust to the man who was making a larger percentage than the arbitrary rate to cut him down to the arbitrary rate. In the one case the man who was making before the war less than the 8 per cent would have to pay a tax after the war upon a basis of earnings that did not in fact exist. The man who was making a greater per cent before the war than the arbitrary rate would be required to pay a tax in the nature of an excess-profits tax—in the nature of a war-profits tax—when as a matter of fact he was making very much less during the war period than he was making during the prewar period.

The injustice and the absurdity of that, to my mind, is too clear to require argument. That is the infirmity, Mr. President—the necessary, unescapable infirmity—of an arbitrary exemption rate.

Not only that, Mr. President, but we know that in the condition of the inflated stocks of the great corporations of this country, based not upon actual assets but very frequently upon supposed earning capacity, by allowing them an exemption, as would be the case under a flat rate of 8 per cent, or 10 per cent, far in excess of what they would be entitled to if their capital were honest capital and represented the actual investment of the business, they would easily escape taxation.

For instance, take the Steel Corporation, referred to here. Everybody in this country knows that the Steel Corporation is capitalized at about a billion and a half dollars. Everybody in this country knows that there was less than $800,000,000 actually invested in the Steel Corporation. Now, if you allow them a deduction of 8 per cent upon their actual capital as represented by their stock, you give them 8 per cent not upon their investment but upon water as well as upon actual investment.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, no, Mr. President. There has been no suggestion of that kind here, that there should be an exemption on water. I am as unalterably opposed to that proposition as the Senator himself.

Mr. SIMMONS. If you go upon the basis of capitalization there is absolutely no way in which you can escape allowing these corporations that are overcapitalized, and that have been reorganized and have been put upon what they call a cash basis, the 8 per cent upon their capitalization; and in many instances I say that would be an exemption twice the amount of the actual investment in the business.

Now, if you allow the Steel Corporation an exemption of 8 per cent upon its total capitalization and you allow the railroads of this country in many instances 8 per cent upon their total capitalization, if the Senator will take the statistics and investigate the matter he will see that the great corporations of this country will virtually escape taxation. That is demonstrated by the House bill. The House bill allows that exemption. Then it fixes a rate of 16 per cent, and upon that rate of 16 per cent with that exemption they only get $200,000,000. If you will apply that 16 per cent rate to the basis of exemption provided in the Senate bill, you will get nearly twice $200,000,000. The infirmity is in the exemption.

I think if the Senator will take the minority report, containing a table showing the capitalization and the rate of tax paid under the Senate bill by about 105 corporations, and make his calculation, he will be convinced that what I am stating is true—that upon this 8 per cent basis, by reason of overcapitalization, by reason of the fact that it raises a man's exemption in many instances, in the case of the railroads, to twice the actual profits, a great many of the biggest corporations in this country will escape taxation altogether.

Mr. President, in that situation what is the just thing to do? Your committee reached this conclusion—that an exemption based upon an arbitrary basis is essentially and necessarily an unjust basis of exemption. Why should everybody in this country be treated as having made the same amount of money before the war? And why, if this is to be a war-profits tax or an excess-profits tax, should it be based upon a supposititious case? Why should it not be based upon the actual profits that each individual and each concern was making before the war?

Your committee therefore said that the only true and equitable and logical basis for an exemption is not an arbitrary basis, is not a basis that assumes what is not true—that every concern was making the same amount of money, no more and no less—but the only just and proper and logical basis is one that takes the actual earnings of these concerns before the war and since the war, and deducts one from the other, and ascertains in that way the amount of their excess profits by reason of war conditions.

Mr. President, the question with your committee was, How should we ascertain what were the actual earnings of these corporations before the war? The Senator says show him an equitable way, show him a just and a fair way. I will ask the Senator if there is any better way in this world for ascertaining the profits of business in this country than going to the books, to the returns that they have made under oath to the Secretary of the Treasury for a given number of years immediately preceding the war and from that sworn statement of theirs ascertaining what profits they were making in their business? That is what the Senate bill does.

What period of years are we to select in order to ascertain that? Some countries have selected three years, some countries have selected five years, some countries have selected as many as six years; but while 12 of the leading countries of Europe to-day have on their statute books a war-profits tax, some of them belligerents, some of them neutrals, of those 12 European countries that three or four years ago put upon their statute books a war-profits tax, 11 out of the 12, every one of them except the one country of Spain, adopted a basis of exemption in principle identical with the one that we have adopted. Not one of them except Spain adopted an arbitrary rule such as is suggested by the Senator from Ohio. They adopted a basis that was founded in the actual experience of the operations of each individual before the war, selecting, as I said, some one period of years and some another period of years for the purpose of ascertaining that fact.

We have sought to do that in this bill. We sought to base the exemption upon the actual facts of the case, giving each individual not an imaginary profit but his own profit, Mr. President, sworn to by himself and given in for the three years immediately preceding the war.

You may extend the years if you want to. I have no objection to making it five. I have no objection to making it as many years as you think are necessary in order to ascertain the normal profits of a concern before the war; but I believe that you can ascertain the normal profits of an industry and every unit of that industry by taking these three years that we have taken—1913, one of the best years we ever had, the best year we ever had before the war in this country; 1912, probably the next best year; 1911, not a good year at all. You can extend it; you can take in two more if you want to; you can take in 1910 and 1909, but the principle is the same. We selected those three, Mr. President, I will say, because, after an investigation by the experts of the Treasury Department, they advised us that those three years seemed to be the most favorable to the business interests of the country, taking the matter as a whole.

Certainly no man can say an injustice is done to him when we allow him his whole profits during that period and when we say, "Unless you are making more than that at this time, you shall not pay any war tax," and when we say, "If you are making more than that now it must be attributable to the war, at least we attribute it to the war," and the Government has a right arbitrarily to do that.

Of course, we have said in a case that is subnormal as a matter of grace we must see that nobody is oppressed and that nobody will have to pay a tax that will be burdensome to him. We have made an arrangement in the bill which any man, by reason of accident, by reason of misfortune, who makes less than something like the average made in the business in which he is engaged, shall be permitted an exemption equal to the average earnings of the industry or of the earnings of similar representative businesses.

Mr. HOLLIS. There is a justification for levying a war-profit tax, there is a justification for levying a high income tax in war times, but there is no logical reason for imposing an income tax on corporations as well as an income tax on individuals. We can illustrate that very easily. Some men own all the stock of a corporation. Take the case of a man who owns all the stock of a corporation. You are taxing him twice when you tax the earnings of the corporation and then tax the man himself. It is precisely similar in the case of corporations where the stock is owned by many people. Under an income tax what you tax is the ability to enjoy. There is no enjoyment of an income until it reaches, through the treasury of the corporation, into dividends and finds the owner of the stock, the man. But it has been found under the financial condition of this country that many corporations were holding in their treasury large surpluses so that the income did not get to the individual where it could be taxed. If we could drive that surplus into the hands of the stockholders where we could reach it by an income tax, there would be no excuse for the income tax on the corporation. That is the reason why I favor the Jones amendment.

Mr. President, I had not intended to find any fault with the majority of the Finance Committee. I think they have done a very remarkable piece of work. I do not like their report as well as that of the minority. It seems to me they have failed to regard many important facts. The minority report shows that there were $5,000,000,000 more of estimates coming in, and since the report was filed those estimates have come in. The minority report called attention to the fact that the $3,000,000,000 provided for to be loaned to our allies was nearly exhausted and $4,000,000,000 more would be needed, and after the report was filed that fact also appeared in the newspapers. The minority report contended that we were not raising enough by taxation, and yesterday there appeared in the Washington Post an item stating that the Secretary of the Treasury thought that a half billion dollars more should be raised under the bill.

Now, when we consider that the Finance Committee is supposed to be a body of conservative men—the very name "Finance Committee" connotes that—when we consider that five years ago we were raising our revenue by taxes on consumption, and when we now consider that the majority of the Finance Committee recommends raising hundreds of millions of dollars out of the income tax and out of war profits, then we see how far we have gone along the road. I am delighted that the majority have gone so far along that road, I congratulate them on it, but they do not go as far along that road as the minority go, and for that reason I shall go along with the minority.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I present two distinct and unrelated amendments to the income-tax provisions of the pending bill, and ask that they be printed separately. I shall move the adoption of one or both at the proper time, reserving, of course, the right to modify either before proposing the same for consideration.

I also ask to have printed in the RECORD in connection with and following each of the proposed amendments the tables which have been prepared and are annexed to each amendment. I think these tables will be useful to Senators in considering the amendments when offered.

There being no objection, the amendments were ordered to be printed and to be printed in the RECORD with the accompanying tables, as follows:

Amend by striking out all after line 10, page 2, all of page 3, and lines 1 to 6, inclusive, page 4, and inserting the following:

"One per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $5,000 and does not exceed $6,000;

"Two per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $6,000 and does not exceed $7,000;

"Three per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $7,000 and does not exceed $8,000;

Mr. NEW. I submit two amendments to the pending bill, which I shall call up at the proper time. I ask that they be printed and laid on the desks of Senators for their information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNARY in the chair). Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none.

Mr. WEEKS. I have a memorandum relative to a vote cast by my colleague [Mr. LODGE] last Saturday, which he desires to have printed in the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent that that be done.

There being no objection, Mr. LODGE's statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"I have a general pair with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. As we are both members of the Finance Committee and support this bill, we had an understanding that each should be at liberty to vote in the absence of the other. Without reflection, I voted in favor of the tax on bank checks on Saturday, to which Senator SMITH was opposed. I ought to have announced his opposition and to have withheld my vote. It made no difference in the result, but I wish to make this statement and to have it appear in the RECORD."

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m., Monday, August 20, 1917) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, August 21, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, August 21, 1917.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, August 15, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

JUDGE SPEER'S DECISION.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I notice that Judge Emory Speer, of the southern district of Georgia, has just rendered a decision with reference to the selective-draft act, affirming its constitutionality. I do not know whether the whole decision is published in the New York Times of to-day or not, but it purports to be the decision, and I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The decision is as follows:

RULES DRAFT ACT IS CONSTITUTIONAL—JUDGE SPEER DENIES HABEAS CORPUS WRITS TO GEORGIANS WHO DID NOT REGISTER—RIDDLES "SLAVERY" CHARGE—TELLS NEGRO SLACKERS, COACHED BY TOM WATSON, THAT CONGRESS HAS RIGHT TO SEND CONSCRIPTS ABROAD.

ATLANTA, August 20.

United States Judge Emory Speer, of the southern district of Georgia, affirmed the constitutionality of the draft act to-day in a decision on the cases of Albert Jones and John Story, who took habeas corpus proceedings in an effort to escape imprisonment for failing to register for military duty.

Jones and Story were guided largely by the advice of Thomas E. Watson, the People's Party candidate for President in 1904, who has been carrying on a furious campaign in his paper, the Jeffersonian, against the draft. Watson appeared in court as one of the attorneys for Story and Jones, who are negroes.

The principal plea made in behalf of Story and Jones was that the draft act was in conflict with the constitutional amendment forbidding slavery or involuntary servitude. Judge Speer held that this argument rested on the assumption that a soldier was a slave, an assumption which he declared to be "abhorrent to the truth." The decision, which was rendered at Mount Airy, Ga., is as follows:

"Arthur Jones and John Story, imprisoned in the Richmond County jail under commitment for unlawfully failing to register for military duty as required by the act of Congress of May 18, 1917, known popularly as the selective-draft law, have made application for writs of habeas corpus. They allege that their imprisonment is unlawful. They charge that the enactment, made to raise a national army, is violative of the Constitution of the United States. It is insisted that the authority exercised by the United States under this legislation is void because the act contravenes the thirteenth amendment. This provides that 'neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as punishment for crime whereof the parties shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction.'

"To agree to this contention we must conclude that a soldier is a slave. Nothing could be more abhorrent to the truth, nothing more degrading to that indispensable and gallant body of citizens trained in arms, to whose manhood, skill, and courage is and must be committed the task of maintaining the very existence of the Nation and all that its people hold dear. The Grand Army of the Republic, the Confederate Veterans, and the Sons of Veterans are not maintained to preserve the traditions of slavery. Nations do not pension slaves to commemorate their valor. They do not 'give in charge their names to the sweet lyre,' nor does—

> "Sculpture in her turn
> Give bond in stone and ever-during brass
> To guard and to immortalize the trust.

CAN'T ESCAPE SERVICE ABROAD.

"The sole additional ground of the petition is that by the common law it was the right of petitioners to 'remain within the realm,' and that this right should now be held to relieve them from military service beyond the borders of the United States. The reply is that the common law—that is, the immemorial English law—can not prevail as to the United States or its people against the explicit provisions of an act of Congress. Nor has a court of the United States power to declare an act of Congress invalid because it is inimical to the common law. The touchstone for such judicial power is the Constitution and nothing else.

"It remains to be determined whether the Constitution has conferred authority on Congress to enact this law. Clause 11 of Article I, section 8 of the Constitution, empowers Congress 'to raise and support armies.' This power is plenary. It is not restricted in any manner. Congress may summon to its Army thus authorized every citizen of the United States. Since it may summon all, it may summon any. Said the Supreme Court in the case of the United States v. Tarble (13 Wallace, 408): 'Among the powers assigned to the National Government is the power to raise and support armies. * * * Its control over the subject is plenary and exclusive. It can determine without question from any State authority how the Army shall be raised, whether by voluntary enlistments or forced draft, the age at which the soldiers shall be received and the period for which they shall be taken, the compensation he shall be allowed, and the service to which he shall be assigned.'

"It is urged that by this legislation Congress has taken over and in this way conscripted the National Guard. This, it is said, is the State militia. It is contended under clause 14 of the article and section above quoted that such militia can be used only to execute the laws of the Union, to suppress insurrection, and repel invasion. Since those petitioners are not members of the National Guard, in no event could their rights in this way be affected. But the National Army is not the militia. An army is a body of men whose business is war. (Burroughs v. Peyton, 16 Gratt., Virginia, 475.) The militia is 'a body of men composed of citizens occupied temporarily in the pursuits of civil life.' (Idem.)

"As we have seen, Congress in the exercise of the power to raise armies may summon to the colors every citizen. It follows that the States, even if they so desire, can not defeat this power by enlisting such citizens in the State troops or National Guard. Was this possible, it would be also possible for the States to prevent altogether the raising of armies by Congress.

RIGHT TO ANTICIPATE INVASION.

"There remains to be considered the contention that Congress can not employ the National Army to be created by virtue of this legislation in foreign lands or beyond the seas. If this is true, then indeed is our country impotent. Then must its people indeed suffer in their own homes, in their cities, and on their farms all the horrors of invasive war. Its military leaders must ignore the settled principle of their science, that the best defensive is the most vigorous offensive. The keen swords of its sons, instead of flashing over the guard of the enemy and piercing his vitals, must be held immovable, as if on an anvil, to be shattered by the reiterated blows of his hammer. Deprived of our aid in the field, successive defeats will visit and crush our allies. Their lands conquered, their navies taken, we must then in turn, solitary and alone, meet on our own soil the impact of victorious and barbarous legions whose laws do not forbid their service abroad but which inspire their fierce and veteran armies to deeds of conquest in every clime.

"Was this contention maintainable, the misguided men who for their personal ease advance it might all too late discover their fatal error. They would discover it in the flaming homesteads, in the devastated fields, in murdered brethren, in outraged wives and daughters, in their lands, their factories, their merchandise, their stock, their all, coolly appropriated by the conqueror as his own; their institutions destroyed; homeless, landless, and beggars to spend whatever interval of degraded life remains to them in abject slavery to the conqueror.

"But our organic law does not so shackle the gigantic energies of the great Republic. After the enumeration of the powers of Congress, among them, as we have seen, 'the power to raise and support armies.' In clause 17 of Article I, section 8, it provides the power to 'make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested in this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof.' Here is the greatest reservoir of power to save the national existence.

"It is said that there is no express power to send armies beyond the sea. True; but there is no express power to enact the criminal laws of the United States, none to convey the public domain, to build a transcontinental railroad, nor to construct the Isthmian Canal, nor to create the Interstate Commerce Commission, nor to declare the Monroe doctrine, nor to make the Louisiana Purchase, nor to buy Alaska, or to take over Porto Rico and the Philippines. This has all been done under the great power to promote the general welfare, just as the selective army will be created under the law here assailed, 'to provide for the common defense,' and beyond and above all is the inherent power of every nation, however organized, to utilize its every man and its every energy to defend its liberty and to defeat the migration to its soil of mighty nations of ferocious warriors, whose barbarous inhumanity for three years has surpassed all others since the death of Attila, the scourge of God. The writs are denied."

PRINT-PAPER INDUSTRY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Federal Trade Commission, transmitting the final report of the findings of fact of that commission relative to the book-paper industry, together with conclusions and recommendations, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. KNOX presented resolutions adopted at a convention of the Retail Merchants' Association of Pennsylvania, held at Mount Carmel, Pa., favoring the enactment of legislation granting free mailing privileges to the men of the Army and Navy, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented petitions of sundry organizations in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of legislation authorizing the drafting of aliens, except alien enemies, into the military service of the United States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Bellingham, Cal., praying that a labor census be taken and that a system of industrial conscription be put into force and indorsing stringent measures for the suppression of criminal syndicalism, which was referred to the Committee on the Census.

ETHYL ALCOHOL.

Mr. BROUSSARD, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to which was referred the bill (S. 2660) amending the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918," reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 110) thereon.

BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

A bill and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BANKHEAD:

A bill (S. 2813) to authorize the Gulf Ports Terminal Railway Co., a corporation existing under the laws of the State of Florida, to construct a bridge over and across the headwaters of Mobile Bay and such navigable channels as are between the east side of the bay and Blakely Island, in Baldwin and Mobile Counties, Ala.; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. TOWNSEND:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 95) authorizing the printing of tax laws as a public document; to the Committee on Printing.

WAR REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. MYERS. My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. KING. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], and the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] are detained on official business.

Mr. GERRY. I wish to announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is necessarily absent on important public business. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-one Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. WEEKS. I submit two amendments to the pending bill, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I shall first discuss the principles which should control in financing a war, and the application of those principles to the pending bill. Before I conclude I shall briefly discuss the amendments I propose to offer to the income provisions of the bill.

The money expended by us in this war will come from one source and be raised by two methods. The money will come from the people of the country. It will be raised partly by taxation and partly by borrowing. There is no other nation in this war-blighted world to-day from whom we can borrow anything. Nations of Europe which were prosperous and wealthy three years ago and eager to buy our securities are to-day impoverished, and some of them almost, if not quite, bankrupt. Whether revolution and repudiation may not follow in some of them no man can now say, but we all know that we can expect no financial assistance from any of them, for years to come; on the contrary, we must bear the financial burdens of several of the Governments in addition to our own. Our problem, then, of financing this war is purely an internal problem. The question is, how shall the burden be divided among our own people; how much shall the Government obtain from each of them; how much shall the Government take as a tax, how much procure as a loan, remembering always that whatever one citizen loans the Government to-day other citizens will have to pay in taxes to-morrow, both principal and interest? We should settle here and now the proportion between the amount of war revenue to be raised by taxation and the amount of war revenue to be raised by loans. The amounts proposed to be raised by us for the purposes of this war, staggering as they must be, without parallel or precedent in all the history of the world, are nevertheless relatively unimportant when compared with the momentous problem of settling correctly the proportion between the amount of taxation and of loans to which the Government will resort.

We know that there is a sharp conflict of interest and of desire as well on this question between the different classes of our people. It is a part of the history of all great wars that wealth has demanded the minimum of taxation and the maximum of loans, while the poorer classes have desired the maximum of taxation and the minimum of loans, and this difference is accentuated now since war profits and excessive incomes are being forced by taxation to contribute some portion of the revenues which war makes it necessary to raise. The reason for this clash of interest is obvious. In the first place, a bond issue means merely the opportunity for a desirable investment by those having money to invest. The bonds must be sufficiently attractive either because of high interest rate, exemption from taxation, or other privileges, so as to divert money from ordinary investment. The bonds must, in the judgment of the purchaser, be as good or a better investment than is offered elsewhere, otherwise the bonds will not be purchased.

Wealth has never yet sacrificed itself on the altar of patriotism in any war. On the contrary, it has ever shown itself eager to take advantage of the misfortunes which war always brings to the masses of the people. That has been true of every war we have had in this country and of every war in Europe of which I have any knowledge, and it is certainly true of the present war. Every bond that is issued must some time be redeemed with interest out of the taxes that the people must pay. Nothing is gained by borrowing except that money for immediate use is obtained from those who have it to loan, to be repaid to them in the future with interest, out of the taxes largely exacted from those who can ill afford to pay them.

It may be argued that the poor equally with the rich will have the opportunity to purchase war bonds. It is small comfort to have the opportunity to purchase bonds if you have little or no money to invest in bonds. The late "liberty loan" is a good example of bonds sold to the poor, or those of limited means. All of the machinery of the Government was set in motion to sell these bonds to the small investor. Every device of advertising was resorted to. Every pressure was brought to bear by banks upon their customers; employers upon their employees, and every invention of clever salesmanship was employed to sell the $2,000,000,000 bond issue.

Mr. President, to what extent this campaign succeeded in selling these bonds to the small investor I do not know, but we all do know that these bonds were a poor investment to the man of small means, in comparison with the advantages which the owners of large incomes could secure from investing millions of their taxable incomes in these nontaxable bonds. It is shown in the minority report on this bill that by exempting these bonds from taxation, the Government has made them the equivalent of an investment paying from 5 to 9 per cent and more to persons with large incomes who will escape the income tax on every dollar thus invested; while to the wage earner and the man with a salary so small as not to be reached by the income tax, who pinched and saved and sacrificed in order to purchase them, they return but a meager 3½ per cent.

I read just a few lines from the minority report:

> The so-called "liberty loan" bonds bear only 3½ per cent interest, but because exempt from taxation are an excellent investment for the very rich but a bad investment for the poor man, to whom such effort was made to sell them. Mr. Kahn, a New York banker, in an address before the Merchants' Association of New York on June 1, 1917, pointed this out and presented a table showing that on the basis of income taxation proposed by the House bill these bonds because of their tax-exempt feature are the equivalent of an investment yielding a return of 5.2 per cent to a person with an income of $100,000, to 9.21 per cent to a person with an income of $2,000,000 or more.

The result of this discrimination is that these bonds will soon find their way wholly into the hands of the wealthy, if they have not already done so, for whom they are an excellent investment, and the old story will be repeated of bond issues which merely mortgage the many for the benefit of the few.

But this is not all, Mr. President. Paying for a war mainly by selling bonds inevitably forces inflation. Inflation raises prices, greatly increasing the cost of living to the masses. There is no escape from this result. As the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] suggests, with sacrifice to the Government also, reason and experience warn us that the policy of financing a war by borrowing the larger part of the money required is in itself one of the severest financial burdens which war brings to the average man.

The borrowing system gives an impression of false prosperity. Where heavy taxation would induce economy, borrowing induces extravagance. The Government must bid against the citizen for supplies. Prices soar, but wages and income do not increase correspondingly. The result is that the ordinary citizen whose income only exceeds his normal expenses by a small margin finds his expenses doubled; his income insufficient to meet his needs, even before the Government has laid a single dollar of taxation upon his necessaries.

It is a fact in the history of war financing, as pointed out by Prof. Charles J. Bullock in the Quarterly Journal of Economics for May, 1917, that "the people are often wiser than the rulers," and he there shows that in the latter years of the Civil War it was the mass of the people that forced Congress and the Secretary of the Treasury to abandon the suicidal policy of borrowing for the more rational one of increased taxation. The experience of this country and others in most wars show that the reasons already mentioned have been sufficient to justify much higher taxation and less borrowing than has usually occurred. But at the present time we have open to us a field of taxation in war profits and excessive incomes, the justice of taxing which all must admit. This is a fact of first importance in determining the proportion which taxation and bond sales shall bear of the expenses of the present war.

Mr. President, the leading economists of the world from Hume, Adam Smith, Ricardo, and John Stuart Mill, down to those of our own time, have, with few exceptions, strongly contended that war should be wholly financed by taxation; that we should in every war pay as we go.

There is to-day in the files of Congress a petition, signed by over 300 of the leading economists of the great universities and colleges of this great country, that is reasoned with a power to appeal to any intelligent man—that petition filed early, almost immediately after the declaration of war, pleads with Congress, not in sentimental phrase but in terms of economic science, to finance this war solely by taxation.

Because I feel that Senators must desire for the future soundness of the finances of the Government to finance this war upon correct economic principles, I repeat that the leading economists of the world, from those who founded the science of political economy down to this hour, with only a few exceptions, which you could number on the fingers of one hand, argue that upon principle, for the good of the Government itself, for the soundness of its financial policy the war should be paid for as we go forward in its prosecution.

Why has it not been done in that way, Mr. President? This is the reason: Wealth is ever potential in government. It has been in every country since the history of the human race began and after society was organized into some form of government. Wealth fattens, sir, upon war loans and war contracts and the speculations with which war is always rife. Hence wealth is always for war. And when it is successful in bringing on a war it is often powerful enough with war ministers and parliaments and congresses to force war loans to the maximum, and by every specious device and argument force taxation to the minimum.

And so with us in this war, within 30 days from the date of the war declaration we had plunged into bond issues upon an unheard-of scale. Morgan came to town, the press urged, the administration recommended, and Congress authorized the issue of five billion nontaxable Government bonds and two billion interest-bearing Treasury notes.

Bad financiering by heavy bond issues and relatively light taxation has always been followed by serious troubles with the Government finances, and severe hardship and suffering for the people, as history amply proves. But we are not dealing with a war of history. This war is so vast, so monstrous in all its possibilities as to render serious mistakes made in conducting any of its operations appalling to contemplate.

The magnitude of its financial requirements are beyond the limits of the largest affairs ever mastered by the experience and wisdom of man. It will be nothing short of the economic crime of all the ages to permit our financial plans to go one hair's breadth further along lines which violate the principles of sound Government finance.

Remember that the solemn counsel of the founders of economic science and the great body of all economic authority, living and dead, urges the policy of paying all the expenses of the war by taxation. Remember that against that unprejudiced advice we have already entered upon a policy which involves us in heavy bond issues. With another four billion bond sale about to be launched, it is time to halt long enough in our headlong plunging to balance bond issues already authorized by taxation before it is forever too late.

Let no one be misled; there is a method behind all this. Our war financiering is being so managed as to commit Congress and the country to a bonded debt five times as large as the amount raised by taxation. Ah, but the majority touch lightly upon the subject by a passing suggestion that at some other time more convenient to the owners of big incomes and huge war profits there will be another tax bill. In the future, sir, at the next session, or in the next Congress—or in the next world—taxes shall be more evenly balanced with bond issues.

But, Mr. President, why not now? Why not now decide upon the proper proportion between taxation and bond issues? Why put it off? Whose interest is to be served by keeping down the rates of taxation on incomes and war profits and mortgaging the masses to the money lenders for an enormous and wickedly unnecessary bond issue? If you will inquire as to that you may be able to locate the interests that are urging this disproportionate bond issue, as compared with the amount of money that ought to be raised by taxation.

No one knows what the future holds for us. The war may end suddenly, as suddenly as it began. Who knows? The whole world was startled with the war declarations that followed fast one upon the other. Possibly the breakdown of this war may come as suddenly as its beginning. Shall it find us with a system of war financing fastened upon us where taxation bears to bond issue a ratio of 1 to 5? It will if you follow the majority members of this committee, and if the war should cease within the next year you would then have allowed the great mass of these war profits to escape taxation. They will have pocketed their war profits, but the people will find themselves saddled with a nine billion debt in the form of war bonds which will already have been issued.

Senators, we have the opportunity now—now, at this time, through this tax bill—to levy a tax upon war profits never before taxed at all in this country or in any other before this war, and to levy a suitable tax upon surplus incomes never taxed at a rate anything like fair by this Government. This is the great, big controlling issue in the discussion and consideration of this revenue bill.

Mr. President, I am going to quote presently from some economists; and it will be observed, as I quote briefly from a few, that I am quoting from the same men over and over again. I am quoting from the conservative economists. I repeat, in order that some Senators who have come in since I began to talk may get this lodged in their minds, that the overwhelming body of all the economists, from Adam Smith down to the present time, have taken the position that, for the protection of Government finance, war should be paid for by taxation as you go. But, sir, the economists whom I quote belong to that conservative group—and there are but few of them—who stand for financing war by both bond issue and taxation.

It is no answer to the great body of the economists of the world, the men who founded the science, to say that history proves that the great majority of the wars—that all of them, in fact—have been financed by a combination of taxation and bond issues. That has nothing to do with the soundness of the principle.

Mr. President, blind is the man, dull, indeed, the brain, that does not read from the war histories of the world the fact that accumulated wealth has been behind the wars and has been potential enough with all the cabinets and all the war ministers who planned the financing to make the prosecution of the war a financial harvest to it. Sir, that is why the world has had so many wars.

I am going to deal with the few economists who believe in financing a war both by bond issue and by taxation; that is, I am going to give you the only authority that you can find, aside from Dr. Seligman, in that little group.

The most conservative economists admit that the tax rate upon war profits and upon surplus incomes should be as high as consistent with the welfare of industry. He would be a pretty poor patriot who wanted to put war-profits taxes or taxes upon surplus incomes higher than that. Accepting this rule, it can not be denied that these sources of revenue can yield greatly increased amounts over that to be raised by the majority plan. Any tax that may be levied upon war profits and on surplus incomes will burden industry little, if at all. If you took all the war profits, you would still have the normal profits left wholly untouched by a war-profits tax.

Mr. President, upon another amendment which I shall offer at another time with regard to the tax upon war profits I shall have occasion again to beg the indulgence of the Senate while I discuss the question of the ability of these great corporations to pay a war-profits tax and conduct their business with very great advantage to themselves, and to pay war-profits taxes away beyond the average rate named in the bill reported by the majority of this committee.

I say, sir, if you took all the war profits, you would still have the normal profits left wholly untouched by a war-profits tax. If you took 80 per cent of the war profits, the lines of business profiting by the war would still have their normal profits left, and many, many millions besides represented by the remaining 20 per cent of their untaxed war profits. That is, a proposed 80 per cent war-profits tax leaves to the corporations an exemption of 20 per cent of the profits that they are making out of this war untaxed at all, or untaxed by the war-profits tax, untouched by it.

A war-profits tax does not lay the hand of the Government on the enormous profits that these great business institutions were making before the war. I shall have occasion, when we come to deal with that question, to present to the Senate tables showing the profits prior to the war of the great body of the leading industrial corporations and 50 of the leading railroad corporations in this country, doing the great bulk of all the railroad business of the country. They were making enormous profits before the war. You do not touch these profits by a war-profits tax. You lay the hand of the Government only upon the excess which war has added to these enormous profits. The majority of the committee have fixed a graduated tax upon war profits, the average of which is only slightly in excess of 27 per cent. How would it injure industry if you were to take 80 per cent of the war profits and not touch by your tax, except by the increased tax upon incomes, the enormous profits made prior to the war?

All these industries, or substantially all of them, had been piling up surpluses prior to the war that were almost—and I think I can demonstrate that they are—unconscionable in their proportions. They had been paying dividends upon their preferred stock, paying interest upon their bonds, and paying dividends upon their common stock, which, as everybody knows, does not represent investment. Besides that, most of these great corporations had been able, because of the monopoly power they possess, controlling markets and prices, to exact from the American people such prices that, in addition to doing all of those things, they piled up surpluses which made the poor, unfortunate, unprotected public furnish new capital to these great, domineering, market-controlling combinations.

It is some of that hoarded, and I think I will demonstrate unjustifiably collected, revenue from the American people through extortionate prices that has been going on for 18 years building up these surpluses that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] seeks to reach and make taxable by his proposed amendment, which he presented yesterday to the Senate in one of the ablest arguments that has been made to this body in the 10 years that I have been here.

Ah, Mr. President, we are going through a period of legislation for which history offers no parallel. We were not elected by the people of this country upon the issues with which we are dealing here. We have no commission, so far as the votes that selected us to come to this body are concerned, which determines for us the views of the people upon these extraordinary questions that are coming up. But, mark you, as sure as the sun shines and God reigns, there will be a review before the people of this legislation, and all of it, such as never occurred before since the history of this Government began, because there never has been such legislation before, and if you do not think that the people of this country are taking account of what is going on here you are not rightly informed.

Who can say as between those who carry the burden of this war, as between the rich and the powerful and the people the great mass of whom compose the army in the trenches, "I have stood under my oath as an impartial judge, and I have dealt as fairly by the people as by wealth"? Who can say that, if you leave these war profiteers more than 20 per cent exempt from any war-profits tax?

But I am not going to discuss that question at this time. I was tempted a little bit aside from what should be the course of my argument here to-day.

I say that such taxes would not discourage industry. When the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] or the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] or the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] talks to this body about not disturbing business just do a little thinking on your own account. They have tiptoed up to this war-profits tax. The war-profits tax proposed in this bill averages approximately 27 per cent. They were afraid business would be disturbed if they did not leave untaxed 72½ per cent of war profits on top of their normal profits.

I say taking 80 per cent of war profits would not discourage business. It is so with surplus incomes. Mind you, we are talking about surplus incomes. It is a little hard to see how any tax levied upon individual incomes in excess of $50,000 a year or more will injure any industry.

Now, Mr. President, with these preliminary observations I wish briefly to review the experience of this country in financing other wars.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. KENYON. I do not think it is very clear to me and those who have not had the opportunity to study closely the bill just what percentage of war profits the Senate committee bill takes. It has been stated by the Senator, I think, at about 27 per cent. Other Senators have stated it at 44 per cent. Can the Senator just make that clear to those who have not had the opportunity of studying the question?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator will just remember, we are now on the income-tax provisions of the bill, and when we come to the war-profits tax provision of the bill I am going to tax the patience of the Senate for a very thorough discussion of that proposition. If I may move along now with my discussion of the income-tax features of the bill, after completing what I want to lay before the Senate and put in the RECORD as to what our experience in war is, I would prefer to defer answering that question to another time.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit a question? The Senator suggested a few moments ago that he was going to call attention to a few statements of publicists.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am coming to that immediately.

Mr. KING. I am very anxious to get those views.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I come now to lay before the Senate the experience of the United States in war financing, in connection with which I quote from these economists. It is very instructive, Mr. President.

EXPERIENCE OF THE UNITED STATES IN WAR FINANCING.

The conditions existing during the Revolutionary War, the unstable Government and its lack of credit, makes the experience of that period in raising war revenue of little use to us now.

WAR OF 1812.

The War of 1812, however, has for us a very practical lesson. In that war, out of a total of $70,000,000 extraordinary expenditure caused by the war nearly 10 per cent was financed by taxation. The result of trying to finance the war with this proportion between taxation and borrowing was a failure complete and decisive. The Government's liabilities increased with no corresponding increase in revenue to meet them. The currency was inflated. The cost of everything was greatly advanced. Nothing but the increased taxes levied during the latter period of the war saved the finances of the country from a complete breakdown. It would be the supreme of folly for us to act upon the assumption that our resources and credits now are so great that they will not show the strain of the awful load of the bonded debt to which it is proposed to subject them. The financial columns of any newspaper to-day will show that the bonds of the allies, even the Anglo-French loan at 5 per cent, are only selling at 94, while the 5 per cent bonds of the United States Steel Corporation are selling at 104. Our own "liberty-loan" bonds can now be bought in the market at slightly below par. Let us not deceive ourselves into the belief that we can throw upon the market the many billions of additional bonds it is proposed to issue and maintain at par, except as they carry a high interest rate that our people ought never be taxed to pay.

THE MEXICAN WAR.

Concerning the finances of the Mexican War, Prof. Bullock, in the article previously quoted, says:

By 1846, when the Mexican War began, the lesson of 1812 appears to have been forgotten; but the resources of the country had greatly increased, the war proved a comparatively small affair, which lasted less than two years and occasioned no strain upon our finances. Without levying internal taxes the Government contrived to meet some $14,600,000 of war expenditures out of ordinary revenues while incurring a net indebtedness of some $49,000,000. This time the loan policy had worked well enough, yet its success was due not to its inherent strength but to the short duration and comparatively trifling magnitude of the strain to which it was subjected. Under different conditions there is no reason for supposing that it would have worked any better than it did in 1812.

It will be observed that in the Mexican War about 22 per cent was raised by taxation and the balance by borrowing. All economists, even the most conservative, with whose works I have any familiarity, and financial historians of that war as well, agree that the amount raised by taxation should be proportionately very much larger, and that nothing but the short duration of the war and its small aggregate cost prevented financial disaster following as a result of the policy pursued. (See Prof. H. C. Adams's Public Debts; Prof. D. R. Dewey's Financial History of the United States; Prof. Bullock in the article Financing the War, in the Quarterly Journal of Economics, May, 1917.)

CIVIL WAR.

Of the financing of the Civil War, Prof. Dewey, of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, than whom there is no better authority in the world, says:

The weakest element in the financiering of the Civil War was the delay in applying effective taxation. * * *

It is easy after the war to blame the Government for its procrastination and lack of vigor in laying taxes, but in 1861 and in the early part of 1862 the way did not appear clear. The blunder of delay was due in part to the fact that a new tariff had just been enacted.

To-day the way is clear. The necessity is apparent. We have no new tariff now from which to expect large income. Delay to provide for adequate taxation now would not be a blunder. It would be something worse. In the Civil War also the war-profits tax was unknown and the income tax was not resorted to for some time. When the income tax was resorted to it yielded little revenue during the war period. The rate never exceeded 10 per cent, and that was upon incomes in excess of $5,000. In 1863 about $2,000,000 was raised from that source; in 1864 about $20,000,000; in 1865 about $32,000,000. The heaviest receipts from the income tax was in 1866–67, after the war, when $72,000,000 and $76,000,000, respectively, was raised from this source. In 1872 the law was repealed. (See Dewey, Financial History of the United States, p. 305.)

Nothing but a complete change of the financial policy of the Government in the second year of the war saved the finances of the Nation from collapse and prevented the success of the Confederacy. The financial policy during the first two years of the war was to use credit as far as possible and assist it by taxation so far as necessary. In 1863 the policy was changed. More than one-third of all expenditures was derived from taxation during the years 1864 and 1865. At least you can say that the policy was modified. Secretary Chase realized that they were rushing every financial business to destruction so far as the Government was concerned if that policy were longer pursued.

And this was done as we have seen, with no assistance from a war-profits tax and with little aid from an income tax. In 1863 Secretary Chase had become convinced of the unsoundness of the theory upon which it had been attempted to finance the war. He had learned by bitter experience that credit should be used to assist taxation instead of placing the principal reliance upon credit. It is to be said also that Congress, and particularly the people, were demanding higher taxation and less borrowing. Accordingly, we find Secretary Chase, in his annual report in 1866 (House Executive Document, vol. 6, No. 3, pp. 10 and 12, 38th Cong., 1st sess.) saying that:

To check the increase of debt must be in our circumstances a commanding object of patriotic solicitude.

That sentiment, I think, should particularly commend itself to us to-day. And in the report the Secretary says:

These statements (referring to estimates) illustrate the great importance of providing, beyond all contingency, for ordinary expenditures and interest on debt, and for the largest possible amount of extraordinary expenditures by taxation, in proportion to the amount raised above the necessary sums for ordinary demands will mean the diminution of debt, the diminution of interest, and the improvement of credit. It is hardly too much—perhaps hardly enough—to say that every dollar raised for extraordinary expenditures or reduction of debt is worth two in the increased value of national securities and increased facilities for the negotiation of indispensable loans.

Prof. H. C. Adams, in his work entitled "Public Debts," in connection with tables published showing the receipts during the Civil War period from taxation and from loans, says:

The criticism which they offer makes its appearance when one asks what would probably have been the financial consequences could the receipts from internal revenue have been moved ahead two years. Suppose, for example, that Secretary Chase could have received from this source $110,000,000 in 1862, $210,000,000 in 1863, and $311,000,000 in 1864; what a change would it have produced upon the course of financial administration? Its moral effect upon the South, working especially through her European sympathizers, would have brought the war to a more speedy termination, the credit of the Government could not have suffered as it did, while the advocates of legal-tender money would have been deprived of the argument of necessity.

Again, he says:

The administration that shrinks from a levy of taxes, lest the war spirit be chilled, shows either a doubtful cause or a weak-kneed Cabinet,

And again, Dr. Adams says:

And, lastly, it is a truth worth remembering that democratic peoples are willing to go all lengths with a government which takes them into its confidence. It is assumed that the purpose of the war is approved, otherwise there is no apology for undertaking it.

Prof. Bullock and Prof. Adams and all the other authorities I have quoted are extremely conservative economists. None of them advocate raising by taxation alone the revenues for a war. But they, in common with all authorities, condemn the unsound financing of the War of 1812, the Mexican War, and the Civil War, because enough revenue was not raised by taxation and too much was raised by loans.

I know of no war in the world's history where it has ever been charged, much less established, that too much of its cost was raised by taxation and too little by borrowing. Fortunately, we escaped in the War of 1812 and the Mexican War from the disastrous financial policy pursued, and in the Civil War we modified that policy in time, but barely in time, to save the Nation. We did not save the people of this country and this Government from untold financial difficulties, from untold sufferings and embarrassments and unnecessary burdens, for a generation of time because of having followed in the Civil War that wrongful policy.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WOLCOTT in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. REED. Referring to a statement just made by the Senator from Wisconsin that it is claimed that further taxation of war profits may chill the ardor of the war, the enthusiasm for the war, I ask how long does the Senator think it would take us to win the war with Germany if we had to do it with gentlemen whose ardor would be chilled if they did not make great profits out of the war?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, Mr. President, I do not think the war would end for several years, to say the least, and when it did end, if we had to depend upon those gentlemen, it would end to our everlasting mortification, humiliation, and shame.

But, sir, standing as we are now on the threshold of the greatest, most expensive, and most difficult war that any nation ever undertook, we can not afford to repeat those mistakes. It would be blind folly for us not to profit by the lessons taught us by our other wars to which I have referred.

The Civil War debt reached its highest point in September, 1865, and the net debt then amounted to substantially two and three-quarter billion dollars. We can get some idea of the character of the debt we are so rapidly saddling upon the country these days when we compare it with what had been heretofore regarded as the enormous debt of the Civil War. We can get some idea also of the mortgage that is being put upon the future of the people of this country by the debt we are now contracting when we remember that after all the principal and interest paid upon our Civil War debt during all these years we had left a debt of about a billion dollars when we entered upon this present war. Yet the Civil War debt was so small in comparison to the debts we are now contracting that an item of that amount might almost get lost in the war bills we are now daily considering. Nothing but the great wealth of our undeveloped resources enabled us to recover even to that extent from the disastrous financiering of the Civil War. We can not hope for the same relative development after the present war that we enjoyed following the Civil War. Moreover, the debts which we will contract for this war, if the bonding plans of the majority of the committee are adopted, will be so great as to lay upon us enormous tax burdens to provide for the interest charge and a sinking fund.

A mistake now may well be fatal. It will certainly cost us untold millions of dollars and thousands upon thousands of lives by unnecessarily prolonging the war.

Mr. President, in this great cataclysm of destruction, when thrones are tottering and cabinets changing almost daily because they do not represent the popular will; when the cry of the distressed and suffering masses is being heard round the world; when Governments are answering with bullets the demands of their people for bread; when the people everywhere are asking for peace while their Governments are demanding war; when our own Government is raising by draft a million men, taken from civil life, eighty-five out of every hundred of whom are protesting against being forced into the Army, I submit, Senators, that this is not a time to adopt a weak, halting, and unjust financial policy for the conduct of the war.

SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR.

The War with Spain in 1898, like our War with Mexico, was of comparatively short duration and made but a slight demand upon the resources of the country, either in men or money. I am not aware that any exact statement of the cost of the Spanish War has ever been published. It is not possible to determine how much of the increased cost of the Army and Navy during the few months that hostilities lasted was caused by the war and how much was caused by the increase in the cost of both the Army and Navy which resulted from the process of upbuilding which had commenced before the war. The figures given by Prof. Dewey in his "Financial History of the United States," pages 466–467, and by Prof. Bullock in his article in the Quarterly Journal of Economics, previously referred to, make it probable that 50 per cent or more of the cost of the war was met by taxation. It is certain at any rate that the Government under President McKinley, profiting by our disastrous experiences in financing previous wars, entered at once upon a vigorous policy of taxation, with the result that one hundred millions of additional revenue was quickly added by taxation to the income of the Government, while a $200,000,000 bond issue at 3 per cent was almost immediately subscribed sevenfold. Over 320,000 bids, aggregating $1,400,000,000 for this $200,000,000 of 3 per cent bonds issued by the Government at that time were sent in by the people.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin pardon me an interruption?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Spanish-American War, so called, was financed by a system of taxation that was neither burdensome nor annoying, but those in authority resolved upon that course firmly at the beginning. Mr. Dingley, who was at the head of the Ways and Means Committee of the other House, would listen to nothing else, and there was not a discordant note from the White House to Congress regarding the policy that this Government should pursue at that time, and at the close of the war, be it said to the everlasting credit of the administration of Mr. McKinley, the Government had more money to its credit than it had at the beginning. We paid as we went along.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I thank the Senator very much for contributing that suggestion out of his experience. I remember that he was in a position at that time to know personally the details of matters that were connected with the financing of that war.

I merely repeat that over 320,000 bids, aggregating $1,400,000 for those $200,000,000 of 3 per cent bonds were sent in by the people. Was not that a most extraordinary response? I do not want to try the patience of Senators who may not agree with me on some of the great issues of this time, but I do appeal to you, one and all, to consider the possibility of mistaking conditions and of the importance of so dealing with legislation here as to get the best response from the public for the pressing needs of the Government in this hour of its trial.

I say, sir, that we would do well to inquire why, with our vastly increased wealth and population, the $2,000,000,000 of bonds at the rate of 3½ per cent, exempt from taxation, which were put upon the market by the Secretary of the Treasury were so slow in winning public support. Why, in fact, did it actually require a nation-wide speaking campaign, with appeals from the hustings, the pulpits, and by speakers in the theaters between acts and at the picture shows between reels, to sell these bonds? It behooves us to know why that was necessary. Why was a concerted newspaper campaign and advertisements in the street cars and in the retail stores of the country resorted to, representing Uncle Sam in lurid colors crying aloud for help? And finally why was the iron hand, covered, it may be, by the velvet glove, but none the less the iron hand, felt by the Government clerk, by the bank customer, and the employee of every large employer of labor, gently but very, very firmly applying the pressure to contribute to the so-called "liberty loan"?

Concerning the financing of the Spanish War, Prof. Bullock says:

> In the Spanish War for the first time in its history the United States followed the correct theory of emergency financiering. * * * The war was of such limited scope and duration that the older theories of Gallatin and Chase could have been followed without causing disaster. But the sounder policy which actually prevailed has established a safer and better precedent which should be followed in the present great emergency. It can not be doubted that, in the words of Prof. Adams, "An adequate policy for the management of war finances is—> a tax policy assisted by credits rather than a credit policy assisted by taxes."

Now, listen—

Such then is the conclusion to which we are conducted by all our experience in war financiering. In the language of Secretary Chase, when he finally found by bitter experience that his policy of borrowing meant ruin to the country—

> We must collect the largest possible amount of extraordinary expenditures [caused by the war] by taxation.

The rule to determine what is the largest possible amount is plain, though its application may not always be easy. We should not tax high enough to cripple industry or impede production. Everyone must accept that. The reason that we should stop at that point is not because of any rights that an individual or corporation may have to a certain income or return on investment but simply because it is wisdom on the part of the Government to leave enough so that the processes of production may continue uninterrupted in order that new taxes for the Government may be produced. This is the iron law of necessity in war time. It is the law that is applied to men; let it also be applied to money.

We are counseled by the highest economic authority, we are admonished by all history, we are commanded by every consideration of justice to the American boys who are marked for slaughter, to the American homes already in the shadow of death, to declare here and now by our votes on this record that the wealth of this country will be taken as mercilessly through the power of taxation as men are taken by force of the draft.

Before passing from this phase of the discussion I wish briefly to call attention to the experience of Great Britain in war finance, both in the present and in previous wars.

EXPERIENCE OF THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT IN WAR FINANCE.

I have had tables prepared from official reports showing the expenditures of the British Government made during its wars in recent years, and the amount of such expenditure raised by taxation and the amount raised by borrowing.

NAPOLEONIC WARS.

These figures show that the Napoleonic Wars cost the English Government £831,446,449. Of this amount there was raised by taxation £391,148,370. In other words, a little more than 47 per cent of the war expenditures were raised by taxation, and a little less than 53 per cent was raised by borrowing.

CRIMEAN WAR.

In the Crimean War, according to the statement of Sir George Lewis, chancellor, on February 13, 1857, there was expended as the cost of that war £76,398,000, of which £40,000,000 were raised by taxation—that is, 52 per cent was supplied by taxation, as against 48 per cent by borrowing. It is fair to say that the Economist (London) of February 24, 1917—one of the leading financial journals of England—states that a little more than 47 per cent of the cost of the Napoleonic as well as the Crimean War was raised by taxation, but I give the official figures.

BOER WAR.

The Boer War, according to the statement of the chancellor, April 23, 1903, cost £217,000,000, of which £67,500,000 were raised by taxation and the balance by loans. In other words, 31 per cent was raised by taxation and 69 per cent by loans. Great Britain has not been able during the present war to maintain the high percentages of war costs paid by taxation which she maintained in the Napoleonic and Crimean Wars. She has, however, raised a very substantial proportion of her war costs by taxation, even including the early months of the war and before her taxation machinery could be fairly put in operation for war purposes.

The British Government, according to the Economist of April 7, 1917, had from the commencement of the present war up to the close of March 31, 1917, raised by taxation £1,081,953,000. She had borrowed during the same period £3,195,053,000. She has, therefore, raised something about 26 per cent of her expenses by taxation. In these expenses also are included her loans to her allies. Eliminate these and the proportion of her taxation to her borrowings is much larger. The estimate for the ensuing year made by the chancellor of the exchequer provides for the raising by taxation of a still larger proportion of the estimated expenditures. The estimates provide £638,600,000 to be raised by taxation, as against the total £1,651,000,000 to be raised by borrowing. But even this proportion of taxation and borrowing is far too small to suit the mass of the British people and to suit the economic authorities of Great Britain. In Great Britain, as here, wealth is all powerful and is driving hard there, as it is here, to finance the war by big bond issues and as little as possible by taxation.

On this subject the Economist of March 3, 1917, says:

As we pointed out a week ago, the proportion of the war's cost that we are now paying by taxes is a rather pitiful figure in comparison with the 47 per cent of war cost that our fathers paid in taxes in the Napoleonic and Crimean Wars. Taxation is much more easily and beneficially raised in war than in peace, and the extent to which we are financing this war by loan is increasing the cost of it and making its consequences a problem of growing difficulty.

And again, in its issue of May 12, 1917, the Economist says:

When the change of Government came last December we hoped that a new spirit in finance would make a more urgent call on the country's pocket.

This paper is speaking for the good of the British nation. It does not seem to be altogether, as some financial journals are, a publication in the interest of those who invest in bonds.

The Economist says:

Mr. Bonar Law made an appeal, the result of which astonished the world, for a loan. As a tax gatherer he has fallen lamentably behind the low standard set by the late coalition. It at least had the excuse that too great haste in these matters sometimes misses its mark. Mr. Bonar Law has not. He has behind him another year of growing expenditure, of continued private extravagance which is wasting the country's resources, of evidence that the country is more than ever determined to go on with the war until the right end of it is secured, of rising prices, and of consequent dissatisfaction among the working classes, which sometimes has results which do not help to quicken the approach of victory. * * *

Another argument (against high taxes) says that the inequities of the income tax are such that it can not be raised without inflicting great hardship. We quite agree. These inequities are already inflicting great hardship. All the more reason for removing them at once, and then doing fuller justice to the powers of this tax in providing money for the war and stopping wasteful spending.

There is thus a great chance for the House of Commons to reinstate itself in public opinion by coming forward to do its old constitutional duty as guardian of the monetary interests of the people.

We should profit by the mistakes of Great Britain. We should not repeat them.

The people of this country have a right to expect that the Congress of the United States will discharge the same constitutional duty which rests upon it.

WHAT THE MAJORITY CLAIM FOR THE BILL.

Turn now to the bill before us and see how it proposes to meet the most stupendous financial problem ever presented for solution to any body of men. Assume for the purpose of the present argument—but for that purpose only—that it will do all that is claimed for it and raise $2,006,970,000. To that amount may be added the $1,333,500,000 estimated receipts for the current year under existing law, or a total of $3,347,470,000 raised and to be raised by taxation.

What are the obligations we must meet, so far as we are now advised during the ensuing year? We have in the first place the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury of $10,735,807,000 of current expenses. We have a bond issue already provided for of $5,000,000,000. Of this amount $2,000,000,000 has been sold, but all of $5,000,000,000 must be raised this year. We have an additional amount estimated in the minority report of $4,000,000,000. Since the minority report was issued unofficial notice has been received from the Secretary of the Treasury that he would ask of this Congress a new bond issue of $4,000,000,000. This makes, therefore, a total of $19,735,807,000, which we know must be obtained from the people of this country during the year. How much more will be called for no one can now estimate, but we do know that the amount I have just stated is the minimum. In other words, this bill provides for meeting by taxation less than 17 per cent of the minimum amount of money to be collected from the people of this country this year.

Is it necessary to go further in this discussion in order to make it apparent that this bill must be so modified as to raise vastly more revenue? Unless all our own experience is to be disregarded as well as that of every other nation which ever conducted a great war, this bill should be amended so as to provide for raising by taxation at least a billion and a half more money for the current fiscal year.

I am aware, of course, that a considerable portion of our bond issues are to be used in making loans to the entente allies and that it is expected some portion of such loans will be repaid. They may and they may not be repaid. I suppose no one will contend that loans made on the responsibility of Serbia, Belgium, Montenegro, or Roumania are good business investments. Russia is in the throes of a revolution, and Italy, if reports are correct, is on the eve of one. The borrowing of the British Government up to the 31st of March exceeded by $9,000,000,000 the estimated annual income of her people. France up to the same date had borrowed $11,000,000,000, while the income of her people is estimated at only $6,000,000,000.

In this connection I desire to read a resolution as reported in the Cotton Factory Times of Manchester, England, of July 13 last, purporting to have been adopted by the first military branch of the Workmen's and Soldiers' Council formed in that country. Representatives from eight battalions of the English Army were present at the meeting, according to the report, at which the following resolution was passed:

Resolved, That the issue of paper money and the paying for the war by means of the exchequer bills, loans, and other devices is essentially unsound and almost dishonest. It means that the young men are asked not only to pay the blood price but also the money price.

A further paragraph of these resolutions demanded—

That some of the suffocating influence of the defense of the realm acts and the censorship be removed. Some men at this meeting are in doubt whether they can be put into prison or even shot for voting these resolutions.

The Economist (London), which is no more to be accused of being an alarmist than is the Wall Street Journal, in its issue of April 7 last, referring to the evident timidity of the government in levying sufficiently high taxes, said:

It is no mere academic pedantry that makes us question this feature of our war finance. It has a practical bearing, not only on after-war problems, when the taxation that our great war debt will involve will be an awkward bone of party contention, but on the smooth working of our industrial machinery during the war. The Barrow strike is a lamentable incident. It is easy to accuse the strikers of lack of patriotism. Their patriotism, like everybody else's, is what it has been made by the conditions under which they have lived and seen other people living. And if these accusations are to be made, there are some items in the report of the comptroller and auditor general of the army appropriation account which show that it is not only among the working classes, whose education and lot by no means tended to foster patriotism, that this quality has in some cases been lacking. There have also been a few contractors whose zeal for their country was blurred by other considerations. Industrial unrest is certainly helped by a system of war finance which leaves the comfort of the well-to-do practically unimpaired, while it calls for great sacrifices in the shape of long hours of hard work often under very trying conditions, on the part of those who do the dull, dirty, and uninteresting part of the tasks that are essential to victory. If the cost of the war were met by taxation imposing real sacrifice even on the richest, the sense of injustice, which is at the bottom of so much of what is mistaken for lack of patriotism among the workers, would certainly be sensibly modified, and so would strengthen a serious weakness in our armor.

Mr. President, I pause just long enough to read a letter that came in my mail, and which was put into my hands as I was coming to the Senate floor. I have only glanced it over hastily. I have not been able to read it in its entirety. I believe it contains matter which it is important to lay before the Senate. I think that if considered as it ought to be considered by the Senators on this floor it will be helpful to us in dealing with the problems the responsibility of which belong to the Senate for the time being.

I am not authorized to state the name of the writer of this letter.

AUGUST 15, 1917.

Senators ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE and WILLIAM J. STONE,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATORS: I beg your pardon for intruding upon your limited time and taxed energies, but your very valuable efforts in behalf of peace in the midst of a war-crazed Congress and my passionate desire to see the world once more sane and above all to see my own native land saved from a deluge of blood and a sanguinary revolution impels me to write and petition you. I am a plain citizen. I am of the working class. I live and move and have my living among them. I know how and what they think; I know their struggle for existence. I am a miner, a member of the United Mine Workers of America. I live in one of the greatest bituminous coal-producing regions in the United States. Let me tell you how my associates feel about this whole program of war and economic plunder that Congress has fastened upon us and permits to be perpetrated against us. I do not care what the kept mistress of the press falsely says in her desire to paint a rosy picture for the powers of an industrial oligarchy; I do not care what some of our false labor leaders say who claim they have safely delivered us into the hands of industrial brigands; I tell you the common people whom I know are opposed to this war. The Mr. Average Man has been bullied into silence. He has had no chance to speak. I know; I am one of them. Let me tell you something solemn, and remember when I speak you are listening to many, many thousands, for I speak what I know they feel but do not speak—yes; but some day they will speak it, not in words but in actions, and then woe be unto those who have plundered and deceived, and this is what I want to say: For the sake of our fair land, its peace and prosperity, work with all your might for a speedy European peace and for an immediate reduction in the cost of living.

The people have never been able to see why our sons should be slaughtered on the battle fields of Europe, except to financially and economically strengthen the house of Morgan. Oh, yes; millions of "patriotic" arguments are submitted in justification, but I tell you we are not convinced. Our heart is not in this war, and it never will be. They may draft and imprison slackers, but that does not change our minds. You Senators know your own selves, in your own bitter experience, what the intrenched, privileged powers can and will do to suppress and vilify a man who stands against this program of war madness for commercial supremacy. If you know, then how heavy must be the hand on us who have little protection. That is why the people are not being heard from; they feel that they dare not speak. But if you will speak the people will be with you, and if you do not speak and a remedy is not found, and that soon, God pity this country. Remember, also, we of the people who work in mine, shop, and factory, we are feeling more and more this awful cost of existence. You men of Congress have pretty good salaries; you appoint committees to investigate; you report; yes, you even pass some laws—but then what? I will tell you. The cost of living still goes up. You Congressmen had better act—act now—not next winter or spring, but now. I know how the people feel. They are not in a mood to stand the pressure much longer. Dear Senators, do not misunderstand my letter. I am not writing a threat. I shall not be responsible for what will happen when fathers and mothers are sorrowed for sacrificing their sons in a war to which they are opposed and, in addition, are driven to destitution by food speculators and gamblers while the great corporations pile up their unprecedented dividends and the rich revel in their luxuries.

In conclusion let me say I am not authorized by anyone to write these things to you. I am voluntarily speaking the voice of my class, out of a mind full of anxiety and with a body worn with the struggle of existence.

Mr. President, I have read that letter with the hope that whatever any Senator may think about the sentiment expressed in it regarding the war it will be weighed as one of the facts of our environment. It is an intelligent and a sincere letter. I state what I believe when I say that I think it represents the views of a great many millions of people in this country. I only bring it to the attention of the Senate at this time in the hope that in dealing with this bill you will have consideration for the class of American people represented by the writer of this letter.

It behooves this Congress, Mr. President, to deal in these times with even-handed justice by the poor and the rich. How the rich shirk and grind not only in times of peace but in times of war, while they prate of patriotism and national honor and democracy! Do not forget that. They are now the loudest advocates of democracy between the two oceans. They who have been serving special interests for from 18 to 20 years, undermining and destroying the democracy of this country, have become the apostles of democracy.

Once in a while you get a bit of evidence on that. I picked up the Post this morning—the Washington Post. It is not often you can quote the Washington Post against any of that ilk, but here is an editorial in the Washington Post. I do not know whether it was written by a citizen of Great Britain. Some of the editorial positions in this fair country of ours are filled not by citizens of the United States but by citizens of Great Britain, as they were before we got into this war, and that fact helped a little to get us in. Just now we have Lord Northcliffe here taking care of the newspaper situation and endeavoring to mold public opinion favorable to England. Here is the editorial in the Washington Post to-day. The editorial is double-columned. It is entitled "The protection of ships." I read a paragraph or two:

THE PROTECTION OF SHIPS.

Great surprise has been expressed by many readers of the Post in regard to the statement by this journal that shipowners refuse to use protective devices which the Government has found to be effective against torpedo attacks, and that no law exists which can compel shipowners to protect their ships. It appears to have been a popular impression that shipowners would be only too glad to adopt any method which would save their vessels.

That impression must have prevailed in the mind of somebody who had not studied the shipowners. The shipowner in the generations that have gone by, like so many other individuals and organizations of wealth, has in the main shown an utter disregard for the safety of his vessel and the safety of the men who sail his vessel. The bottom of the ocean is bedded with hulls that have been sent to sea to be sunk in order that greed might collect the insurance. Sir, if any evidence of that fact needs to be offered, turn to the criminal statutes of every maritime nation of the earth and you find it has been regarded as necessary to write a law into the statute books to punish as a crime the sending of vessels with seamen on board to be sunk for the insurance. In London there stands a statue reared to the memory of a member of the British Parliament who devoted his life to trying to correct the great evil that the unscrupulous shipowners were guilty of toward those who sailed their vessels. Kipling, in one of his great poems, has in immortal verse embalmed the meanness and the greed of the shipowner. It is pretty rare indeed to find Senators standing on this floor uttering one word of criticism of these long-existing wrongs. A little outbreak here and there on the part of labor seeking to get just a bit more for the family will inspire the introduction of a bill or an amendment to jail the strikers or to authorize resort to armed soldiers to deal with them, but down through the centuries the wrongs that wealth and power have imposed upon the great masses of humanity have too often passed unchallenged in any legislative body.

It appears to have been a popular impression that shipowners would be only too glad to adopt any method which would save their vessels.

The fact is, however, that shipowners have refused to go to the expense of fitting their vessels with torpedo-resisting devices, although the Government has called their attention to these devices and to methods of stowing cargo which would help to keep vessels afloat even if struck by torpedoes. Because these devices and methods cost money, the shipowners will not adopt them. They are obtaining fairly cheap war insurance from the Government, and as they are seeking profit and not the welfare of the United States or the allied governments they do not care whether their vessels sink or survive. If the ships sink they collect insurance; if they reach port the owners reap huge profits in the shape of freight rates. The death of crews and the loss of materials badly needed by the allies mean nothing to the shipowners.

The United States can not afford to permit this state of affairs to continue. Shipowners must be forced to do their share toward winning the war.

Ah, Mr. President, all aggregations of capital, all receivers of great surplus incomes, must be compelled. They will not volunteer. Hundreds of thousands of men have volunteered to go into the Regular Army. Wealth has not volunteered anywhere to speak of.

Oh, somebody may say that they have come down here to Washington, the heads of all these great business institutions, and are giving their services free to the Government.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of New Mexico in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If the Senator will yield, I should like to hear him upon a proposition as to curbing this tendency on the part of shipowners by providing that no ship shall sail from a port of the United States that is insured for more than three-fourths its value. Would that not have a tendency to curb the evil which the Senator so graphically describes?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think that would help some.

Mr. VARDAMAN. They can do it now.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Is it a law?

Mr. VARDAMAN. No; but they could administer it that way.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have not looked into this matter of insurance.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If the statement the Senator has made concerning the sinking of ships has the facts to support it, it is an alarming condition.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have not made the statement; I have just read from the Washington Post.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I believe a remedy of that kind would take away the incentive to the shipowners to sink ships, and that it would be of great value in preserving life and property.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But at the time the seamen's act was pending before the Senate I pointed out many times this special and particular evil, this damning crime on the part of shipowners, together with the other wrongs that they were imposing upon the sailors; and, Mr. President, I want to remind the Senate that there were not very many men rising here volunteering suggestions as to how those wrongs involving human life could be corrected. I am glad that war even may arouse such interest in bringing these wrongdoers to book that there may be some prospect of getting legislation bearing upon this subject.

Mr. TOWNSEND. In this connection, may I ask the Senator if he has any knowledge as to whether the Government, knowing the fact that ships are being sent out and sunk without protection, is insuring them with the people's money at their full value.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I must say that I just saw the editorial this morning. While it did not greatly surprise me, I have not had any opportunity after reading it to make any inquiry as to the facts. I put it before the Senate, and Senators who are interested can pursue the facts.

Mr. President, I resume the current of my discussion.

Even the strongest of the entente allies, England and France, will be in no position to repay loans for a long time, and if this war should still last for several years, what political transformations may occur in any country in Europe no one can foretell.

A man's patriotism is indeed what it has been made by the conditions under which he has lived and seen other people live, just as stated by the London Economist; and I quote those words from the London Economist. Too many people, for the comfort of the ruling classes in the warring countries of Europe, are asking to-day why they should give their all to the Government from which they have received so little, while the favored classes pass through the furnace of war unscathed. All that can be said to a certainty is that no man can tell when, if at all, we will receive back the billions of dollars we are loaning and are about to loan to the Governments of Europe. We may sometime get it all; we may never get more than a part; and its collection may be made at the cost of another war, for the wealth of this country would have power to produce another war if they had the interest to impel them to do it. But this we do know, that the money to make these loans must be collected from our people at the present time. And we know also that as a means of helping to meet the emergencies of the present war the securities we are receiving can aid us little if at all.

If the billions of our people's money which we are now smilingly tossing into the furnace of the European war were all we had to consider, the question would not be so serious. But if this war should last another year or two years, think what it will mean to the financial resources of this country. Remember that we have not yet burned up a single dollar's worth of powder; we have not yet exploded a single shell, the cost of some of which exceed the annual income of the average man. If this war shall last for another fiscal year, our expenditures will not be counted in the billions merely but in tens of billions. We will have to reckon with an expenditure of probably thirty or forty billion dollars for the succeeding fiscal year, if this war continues. Do you know what that means? That is a sixth of the total wealth of the United States. It is not improbable that the entire income of all the people of the country, estimated at $38,000,000,000, will not equal the money cost of the second year of this war. We must face these facts and realize the true situation in the framing of this bill and lay firm the foundation of our financial policy by an adequate and just system of taxation at the beginning.

That brings me to discuss some of the features of this bill.

THE CONSUMPTION TAXES.

Omitting the Virgin Island products, referred to in Title X of the bill, and which is estimated to produce only $20,000 in revenue, Titles V to XI of this bill embrace a class of taxes which we have described as consumption taxes. These taxes are summarized in the minority report and include taxes upon transportation, upon freight or passenger service, upon telephone and telegraph messages, upon automobiles, motorcycles and boats, upon admissions to places of entertainment or amusement, stamp taxes, an excise tax upon tea, coffee, sugar, and cocoa. This last-mentioned tax is to be levied upon the articles already produced or imported, as well as upon those to be produced or imported. There are also taxes upon letters, increasing letter postage and the postal rates on second-class matter, and an additional tax upon publishers. There is also a tax upon medicines and various other articles consumed and used in the homes of the country.

All of the taxes under this head will, if the estimate of the majority of the committee is correct, yield something in excess of $400,000,000 in taxes. In the minority report we state briefly our reasons for omitting these taxes. While some of these taxes could more nearly be defended than others, the minority of the committee proposes to omit them all. As I shall presently show, we can raise more than $1,500,000,000 on incomes in excess of that provided for in the bill and not resort to this class of taxation at all. So long as this war can be paid for by recourse to surplus incomes and war profits without possible injury to productive enterprise and still leave to the possessors of such incomes and profits not only the comforts but the luxuries of life, the necessaries of the poor should not be burdened by any additional tax whatever; and you can not justify such taxes.

Taxes upon the necessaries of life are wrong in principle. Many of the articles taxed in this bill already pay a tax in the form of a tariff duty. They are largely articles the consumption of which is necessary to maintain the health and the well-being of the mass of people. Why stop with taxing tea, coffee, sugar, and medicines of the poor man? Why not levy a tax upon every pound of flour and upon every peck of potatoes and upon every ounce of butter that he buys for his family? The principle is the same. I am aware that taxes of this sort have been resorted to in previous wars. They may have been resorted to in all wars, so far as I know. I am aware also that it has been the history of all wars that the burdens imposed both on life and property have been borne by the masses of the people, while the few have used them as a means of acquiring great fortunes, through which they have dominated the life of the country when peace was restored.

You have but to call the roll of American millionaires to remember how many of them laid the foundation for their fortunes in the Civil War. Jay Gould and black Friday, Morgan and his unsavory munition contracts, which were the subject of a congressional investigation; Vanderbilt, the ship-purchasing agent of the Government, who purchased and sold to the Government condemned and worthless vessels, as the result of which he made unnumbered millions of dollars—all will be readily recalled upon mere mention. Rockefeller, Carnegie, and many others laid the foundations of their great wealth in the necessities of the Government in the Civil War. That was not the patriotism we are commending so highly to-day, which leads a man to shoulder a gun and die in the front rank of battle. But they had cunning and sagacity, and the determination to grow rich out of the opportunities for profit which the war offered, while the great mass of the people were giving their property and their lives to defend and perpetuate our Government. The blackest page in all our history is that which tells this story of the great American fortunes made out of the Nation's needs during the Civil War. But, Mr. President, we had hoped that a new day had dawned, that it would no longer be true that the few should profit and grow wealthy by war while the many bear all its burdens and make its supreme sacrifice.

The fact that in previous wars taxes have always been laid upon the necessaries of the mass of people to support the wars is no more true than that in previous wars "war profits" have not been taxed, nor have excessive incomes been heretofore made to pay anything like a due proportion of war taxes. The very fact that we are now able to segregate and bring under contribution for the purpose of taxation some portion of the profits made by the war, as well as the surplus incomes of the country which it is the Government's principal business to protect, is the very reason why we can afford to relieve the great mass of the people from all direct taxes upon the necessaries of life they have heretofore been obliged to bear. I know of nothing more in keeping with the elevated purpose and lofty ideals for which it is claimed we are engaging in this war than to eliminate these consumption taxes from this bill. And I know of nothing that would more conclusively show that the controlling purposes and ideals in this war are heartless and sordid than by leaving these consumption taxes in this bill. Who will believe that we are waging a war for the oppressed in other countries while we are oppressing our own people with unnecessary and unjust taxation?

It is only very little of the burden of the war that you can shift from the shoulders of the people to the wealth of the country by methods of taxation. Something over $400,000,000 can be so shifted by the changes in this bill we propose. It is not $406,350,000 alone, although that is something. It is an earnest of good faith. It helps keep the promise which has been made that private interests shall not be promoted or selfish ends attained by this war.

Here is something that seems to be quite overlooked by the majority of the committee in framing this bill. Again and again upon this floor during the discussion there has fallen from the lips of the chairman of the committee [Mr. SIMMONS], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and others the suggestion that it is a highly proper thing in a war-revenue bill to so distribute the taxes that all the people shall bear their share. Mr. President, before this revenue bill was conceived this war had already laid a tax of 50 to 100 per cent upon every man, woman, and child in the higher cost of war prices for all the necessaries of life. The poor and moderately well to do are paying war taxes amounting to several times $400,000,000 every month in the increase of prices of everything they buy which has resulted from the war. It makes little difference to a man with an income of $25,000 or $50,000 a year or more whether the prices of the necessaries of life are doubled or trebled, for but a small part of his income goes for the necessaries of life. But it is very different with the man whose annual income is $700, the average income of the wage earner, or the man with an income of $2,000 or $3,000; it is different for them.

In either case his income is substantially all expended for necessaries according to his station in life. Double what he must pay for his necessaries, with no corresponding increase in his earnings, whether wages or salary, and he can not meet his expenses. In most cases he was not able to buy more food or clothing before the war than was necessary for himself and his family according to his position in life; but if the prices of necessaries are doubled he can not buy enough of even the plainest food and clothing, pay the rent, and support his family in the station of life he occupied before. His whole manner of living is disorganized, his production decreased, and the Government in consequence becomes the loser. Here is where the real financial burden of war rests. Here is where the individual is called on for real sacrifice. I am not talking sentimentality to Senators, but put it on the hard, cold basis of self-interest for the Government. It is at this point that the Government, not for philanthropic reasons but to keep unimpaired its own strength and vigor, must see to it that the burden is made as light as possible.

That is precisely what the majority bill does not do. I know of nothing that will more certainly destroy confidence in this war, in its aims and in its purposes, than to attempt to assess a large portion of the war cost upon those for whom the struggle is already too hard, while the possessors of surplus incomes and war profits escape by paying a tax so small as not to deprive them of a single luxury, much less a single comfort.

While this bill proposes to raise $2,006,000,000, and while the taxes which the minority of the committee would strike out amount to $406,350,000 only, anything which by increase of price you add to the burden of the man whose earnings are exhausted by excessive prices is just the crossing of the line where you begin to produce a condition under which the family is badly nourished; where you begin to undermine the national strength. From that standpoint alone you can not afford to do it when you have in your hands these great corporations, these holders of immense surplus incomes, to whom you can have recourse without impairing at all their capital, without touching their capital, by taking only a part—a minor part—of their income, leaving them more than they can possibly use, rather than add by one poor scruple to the burden under which the poor people of this country are already staggering in order to take care of their families.

So long as there is an income to be found in the country so large that it yields to its possessor a surplus over and above what he needs for the comfort or even luxuries of life for himself and family, I am in favor of taking such portion of that surplus income by taxation as the Government needs for war purposes, and if it needs it all I am in favor of taking it all before we take one penny from the slender income of the man who receives only enough to provide himself and family with the bare necessaries of life. So long as a man can be found who is making "war profits"—that is, profits due to war in excess of normal profits—I am in favor of taking such portion of those profits by taxation as the Government needs for war purposes, and if it needs them all, I am in favor of taking them all before one penny is added by taxation to the burden of the man already staggering under the load of high prices caused by the war. This may be a principle new in war finance, but it is the very least that the masses of the people should be asked to accept, and is much less than even-handed justice would demand for them.

They pay the cost of the war, though not directly taxed a dollar for it. They pay it in increased prices and in excessive hours of labor. They pay it in service not only on the battle fields but wherever men and women toil in the dreary occupations of life. More than all, they pay it with their blood and their lives and the greatest sacrifice of all—with the blood and life of their loved ones. Surely, sir, it is not too much to ask that they be relieved of the burdens of war taxation until those who profit by the war and those who live in luxury and security in spite of the war have contributed a substantial portion of their surplus. That, sir, is what the minority of this committee demands. It is all that they demand. I am no prophet, but I am greatly mistaken if the people accept this majority bill. Consumption taxes upon the necessaries of the people will be no longer tolerated in war. That primitive and savage form of taxation is as much out of date as are the primitive weapons of warfare. Unless the plan for financing this war shall recognize that fact, that plan will fail, and, in my opinion, fail disastrously.

I shall at the proper time offer an amendment to the income-tax section of this bill.

In the committee bill, as well as in the amendment I shall offer, the maximum rate of tax plus the rates of the existing law is 50 per cent. The rates are so applied, however, in the amendment I propose to offer as to reach the maximum rate earlier than in the committee bill, and in that way provide for raising substantially larger amounts.

In the proposed amendment the war tax begins to apply at $5,000 and increases 1 per cent for each increase of $1,000 of income until the income exceeds $30,000. From that point until the income exceeds $47,500 the increased taxation is applied for every $2,500 increase in the income. The maximum rate of taxation proposed in the amendment—35 per cent—is reached, therefore, at incomes in excess of $47,500. The following table shows the rates of the committee bill, the amendment I propose, and the rate of the British law as applied to incomes in excess of $50,000 up to incomes in excess of $2,000,000.

Income in excess of—	Committee bill.	Proposed amendment.	British law.
$50,000	16	39	42½
$60,000	19	40	42½
$80,000	24	41	42½
$100,000	29	42	42½
$150,000	33	43	42½
$200,000	37	44	42½
$250,000	41	45	42½
$300,000	44	46	42½
$500,000	47	47	42½
$1,000,000	48	48	42½
$1,500,000	49	49	42½
Over $2,000,000	50	50	42½

The estimated amounts of income which will be produced under this proposed amendment, the committee bill, and the rates of the British law applied to the same incomes, are as follows:

The committee bill is estimated to produce $417,763,083. The proposed amendment would yield $658,787,434. The amount which it is estimated the committee bill will produce, plus the amount produced by the rates of the existing law, is $523,244,750. In the same way, by adding the amounts which it is estimated the proposed amendments will produce to amounts produced under existing law, we get $741,683,049, produced by the amendment which I shall offer. The rate of the British law applied to the same incomes would give $1,162,577,817.

The present corporation tax based on incomes is estimated to yield $360,000,000, added to the amounts above, which it is estimated will be produced by the majority and minority plans, gives a total income tax for the majority $777,763,000 and for the minority $1,018,787,434. We propose no change in the amount of what is called the corporation income tax as provided in the majority bill, because that income when distributed to stockholders becomes taxable as individual income unless it is hoarded as surplus and not distributed. We think that is exactly what the majority bill permits, and by virtually leaving it to the Secretary of the Treasury to say what amount of surplus a corporation may keep, and making his ruling final, the way has been opened for corporations to escape payment of millions of dollars of taxes. When that stage of the bill is reached and the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] comes before the Senate, I shall have some observations to submit on that provision. That provision in the bill is one of its worst features, and while I shall not turn aside now to discuss it, I hope to do so later, and the bill should certainly be amended in this respect before it receives the approval of this body.

The only valid objection that can be made to the income amendment which I propose is that its rates are too low, especially as applied to the larger incomes. The only justification for presenting it now is that, in my opinion, it is the best we can hope to get at this time. If the Senate will adopt it, it will be a long step in the right direction, and no one can charge that it does not treat the recipients of large incomes most generously nor pretend that it will in any way burden industry.

Here are just a few of the larger incomes in excess of $2,000,000. This list was prepared in 1913 during the congressional debates on the income-tax feature of the revenue bill, and was published in the New York World. The list would need to be added to very largely to make it anything like complete at the present time.

Name.	Capital.	Income.
John D. Rockefeller	$500,000,000	$50,000,000
Andrew Carnegie	300,000,000	15,000,000

Thomas F. Ryan	50,000,000	2,500,000
Edward Morris	45,000,000	2,250,000
J. O. Armour	45,000,000	2,250,000

What does a tax of 50 per cent mean upon incomes like these? What, for that matter, does a tax of 40 per cent mean upon incomes of $50,000 or $60,000, or 42 per cent upon incomes of $100,000, or of 45 per cent upon incomes of $250,000? It leaves the principal untouched, which will produce the same or larger amounts the next year. This is not conscripting wealth at all. It is merely taking a percentage, all too small, of surplus income. In no respect can it be compared with the conscription of men. Every comfort and every luxury that mortal man could desire is still within the reach of the possessors of these incomes after every dollar has been taken which my proposed amendment would take.

Remember that the rule to be applied alike to taxation for war purposes and to the conscription of men for the same purpose is simply what is best for the State. If a widow has two sons upon whom she is dependent for support and the draft takes one and leaves the other, it is not, as we have been repeatedly advised by the rules promulated by the War Department, because of any tenderness for the widow and mother that one son is left. It is merely because to draft both into the Army would mean that the widow would be left without support and become a public charge, to the injury and detriment of the State. The same rule applied to incomes would take all the surplus income. Suppose all incomes were taken and it became necessary for our citizens of great wealth to use a little of their capital to live on, it would do no harm to the State. It might even result in forcing the members of this class to a little wholesome industry whereby the State would greatly benefit.

Turn the question as you will, there is no valid argument against taking as large and, I think, a much larger portion of incomes than is proposed in the amendment which I shall offer when we consider the millions of our people who are sacrificing the comforts and necessaries of life, and even life itself, for their country's sake. Always remember that the high prices already upon us have taxed the common people of this country for the support of this war to a much greater extent than the wealthy class would be taxed if every dollar of income of the members of that class were taken by taxation.

When bread lines shall be a familiar sight in every city of this land, as they are bound to be if the present price of the simple necessaries of life is maintained during the coming winter, when cold and hunger are daily visitors in many thousands of homes which have known only comfort heretofore, a condition certain to exist during the coming winter months unless relief from present prices can be found, it will be small satisfaction, I think, to the Members of this Congress to realize that they have contributed to the want and suffering of the mass of people by refusing to place even an approximately fair portion of the financial burden of this war upon the rich.

I am aware that it is said that a further tax bill will be presented to the next session of the Congress. A further tax bill perhaps will be presented to meet further demands for money to prosecute the war, but in this bill we are dealing with the demands already made. We are raising money for purposes already known, and we should raise it now from those to whom the taxes will be the least burden. But more than that, as I have before pointed out, any attempt at the next session to increase the taxes upon large incomes and war profits will be met by the combined opposition of the wealthy and powerful interests of the country. They can argue, and argue with force, that business has adjusted itself to the burden of taxation imposed by this bill. If it is difficult to-day to levy anything like a fair tax upon those interests, it will be a doubly difficult thing to-morrow.

When the section of the bill is reached involving the subject of war profits I shall submit amendments materially increasing the rate of taxation proposed in the majority bill upon war profits. Those amendments if adopted, taken with the proposed increase in the tax upon incomes, will so increase the revenues to be provided by this bill as to permit of the elimination of all consumption taxes proposed to be levied in Titles V to XI, inclusive, and still raise a billion and a half dollars or more than it is proposed to raise by the committee bill.

Mr. WEEKS obtained the floor.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum has been suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Hale	Lodge	Sheppard
Brady	Harding	McCumber	Sherman
Brandegee	Hollis	McKellar	Shields
Broussard	Husting	McNary	Simmons
Calder	James	Myers	Smith, Md.
Chamberlain	Johnson, Cal.	New	Smith, Mich.
Culberson	Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Smoot
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Sutherland
Dillingham	Kellogg	Page	Trammell
Fletcher	Kendrick	Penrose	Vardaman
France	Kenyon	Phelan	Weeks
Gerry	King	Pittman	Wolcott
Gore	La Follette	Saulsbury
Gronna	Lewis	Shafroth

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has been discussing with his usual enthusiam one of the vital sides to the proposition for regulating the method of raising the wherewithal to conduct a great war. There is reason in some of the things which the Senator from Wisconsin has been discussing, but I do not agree with his conclusions. Neither do I entirely agree with the conclusions of the Committee on Finance, although, taking a very unpromising bill, they have worked out a proposition which, it seems to me, justifies the support of the Senate.

It is regrettable that in discussing a bill of this kind the Senator from Wisconsin persists in arraying class against class; in creating those animosities which are harmful to the public. In this particular instance his attack on wealth seems to me to be particularly unjustified. He repeats what has been said so frequently, that it is the result of the activities of wealth which has brought on this war. It seems to me that an answer to that may be made conclusive—that is, this country has been extremely prosperous during the past three years; that wealth has been adding to its accumulations more rapidly perhaps than ever before, so that now there is a certainty that a considerable part of that accumulation, or a considerable part of the revenues of wealth during the period of the war, must be used for the Government's purposes, and, therefore, that the net result to wealth, because we are in a state of war, must be less than would be the case if we were solely providing for the needs of other belligerents. If that is the case—and I think there is no answer to it—what folly it would be for wealth in this country to have precipitated the country into war!

Neither do I think it is fair or reasonable to claim that wealth and those connected with wealth are not doing their fair share in the physical as well as in the material requirements of the Government. I was told by the commandant of the Marine Corps the other day that in one day 40 students from the University of Minnesota enlisted as privates in the Marine Corps; and that is only typical of what has been going on all through this country. The best of our young men have been as ready to respond to the country's call in this war as any class of citizens ever were; and in my judgment it is a scandalous libel to suggest, even, that wealth and men connected with wealthy classes are not doing their full duty in this emergency.

Then there is one other point made by the Senator from Wisconsin which I want to bring to the attention of the Senate, and that is his reading from this morning's Washington Post an article relating to shipping and shipowners failing to equip their ships with apparatus which would prevent their destruction by torpedoes. This was used as a reflection on shipowners and to suggest their willingness that their ships should be sunk so that they might collect the insurance.

Of course, there is a complete answer to that proposition. In fact, the Senator from Wisconsin did not introduce it for any other reason than to create prejudice in the minds of those who heard the editorial read. He had no information on the subject; and when the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], ever ready for an investigation, suggested that an investigation be made, the Senator from Wisconsin replied that he had no knowledge of the facts in the case.

The real facts are, Mr. President, that the Government is insuring most of these ships on a basis equivalent, I understand, to about one-half of the value of the ship; that the real value of the ship in these times, based on the rates which the Government itself is paying, is probably at least three times the cost of the ship in the first instance if it were built before the war, and that any sinking of a ship to-day means an irreparable loss to the owner of the ship. There can not be anything in that kind of a contention. It simply shows a disposition to embarrass and to involve the differences which naturally exist between those who have made the majority and the minority reports on this bill.

Now, I am going to try to answer some of the general propositions which have been made by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], who support the minority report.

To my mind there are many vital reasons why we should not take all of the income of the country and why we should not take all of the surplus revenue earned as a result of the war, and it is those reasons which I wish to bring to the attention of the Senate. Lest I forget it, or those who are here now may not be later, I want to suggest that while in this bill we are raising substantially the same proportion of the annual cost of the war to ourselves that England is doing, which is the highest proportion of any country in the world, that England has reached this stage of taxation after three years, and that makes a radical difference to the business of the country. Business wishes to look ahead and see where it is going to end. It wants a terminus in plain view; and if it has that terminus, then it has confidence, and we have good business in this country. Therefore if we can raise taxation sufficient for our necessities this year based on a plan which is fundamentally sound, we can undoubtedly raise a larger amount based on exactly the same plan next year without any more embarrassment to the payers of the taxes than the embarrassment which they will meet by paying a lesser amount this year.

I hope I have made that plain—that if, through a term of years, we can gradually increase the rate of taxation based on the same general plan, we are not going to add to the difficulties of raising the money.

One of the most difficult problems which this Congress has had—and it has had a multiplicity of them—has been to face the raising of a sufficient amount of money to prosecute the present war without injuring or seriously affecting any business interest in our country. I want to call to the attention of Senators the fact that the financing of war to-day and the financing of war a hundred years ago, even taking into account the difference in the wealth of countries in the two periods, is a very different and a much more difficult proposition. The whole expense of war has enormously increased per man engaged, so that while we raise a billion dollars to-day with perhaps as much ease as we did a hundred millions during the Civil War period, relatively speaking we raise for war, based on population or even wealth, very much more to-day, taking into account the number of men engaged, than ever before. Taxation should not be levied for the purpose of attacking an industry or for the promotion of socialistic policies by evening up the relative wealth of individuals, for, necessarily, if a source of revenue is harmed by the imposition of unreasonable taxation, it makes the obtaining of sufficient revenue in the immediate future all the more difficult. If the war continues indefinitely the country may be bled white to pay the cost. This burden is unescapable, but if we are bled scientifically it may lead to the purification of our blood. If we are bled wrongfully, it may lead to pernicious anemia.

If we can finance the war on the right basis, so far as possible putting the burden on future and unpledged savings of the country, and if we can keep our manufacturing and merchandising and agricultural communities supplied with money and credit, and let the war demands intensify business activities, we can prevent superimposing upon the inescapable miseries of the war the entirely preventable miseries of panicky, hard times. Therefore, assuming that the war will continue indefinitely, it becomes necessary to provide the required revenue for one year, and equally essential that this be done in such a way that increased revenue can be collected next year without materially changing the system from which it is obtained.

The more I study this subject the more convinced I am in the correctness of the theory that not only should the civil expenses of the Government and the interest on the public debt be provided by taxation, but that a sufficient amount, in addition, should be produced from the same source to guarantee that the cost of the war will be liquidated by the present generation. There is no soundness to the theory that those of to-day should not only fight the war but pay the bills. We are not fighting exclusively on our own account; we are fighting for future generations as well, and there is every reason why those who will receive these benefits should bear at least a proportional share of the financial cost of the war. They can not assume the physical cost; that must be borne by the present generation. If I could dictate the taxation policy of the Government, I would add to the two primary reasons for laying additional taxation the requirement that an amount equal to one-twentieth of the cost of the war should be raised by taxation each year, so that at the end of 20 years the entire indebtedness of the war would be liquidated.

It is very difficult to find on any subject a greater lack of knowledge on the part of those discussing the question than that of war finance. In the final analysis we are not going to gain materially—in fact, not at all—by reviving and putting into operation schemes of taxation which have, time and time again, been demonstrated as unwise, unsound, and unproductive. The experience of the war has pretty clearly demonstrated what can and can not be done.

One of the greatest fallacies existing is the theory held by a few people that the cost of the war should be entirely obtained from bond issues. If there is a greater fallacy it is the one that the larger part of the cost of the war should be obtained from direct taxation. That is the popular view to take, popular on the assumption that taxes are to be levied against the rich and that the poor are going to escape; in other words, that it is as legitimate to commandeer money as it is to draft men. The people who make this argument fail to remember that the draft applies to the rich and poor alike; in fact, it includes all classes of citizens, and one of the fundamental excuses for imposing conscription is that it is absolutely democratic. If an examination were made of the result of the draft being imposed it would be found that it has been absolutely impartial in its selections, although undoubtedly it will be shown that the wage earner will escape much more frequently than those who do not belong to that particular class, because men of that class engaged in certain occupations may be exempt.

Moreover, wealth has a great variety of uses, not necessarily selfish and personal but from the public standpoint, and it is some of those uses I shall wish to point out in my argument limiting the amount of money to be raised from taxation. I have said that the experience of the world should teach us a course we can safely follow. That experience may be obtained from our own financial operations as well as those of European countries, and more particularly the experience of the nations of Europe, especially England and France, because they have financed more wars and have financed them better than we have done. Our own experience in this direction is not an appealing one. Neither in the War of 1812 or the Civil War did we establish a precedent which can be wisely or safely followed, and the financial operations connected with the Spanish-American War were so small in comparison with what will be required during the present war that they do not furnish a suitable example; but, on the other hand, we may safely follow European precedents as far as they apply to our conditions. The fact is that during the Spanish-American War we raised but $25,000,000 during the year 1898 from internal-revenue taxes in addition to what we had previously raised, and during the year 1899 we raised $125,000,000; and the proportional part of the cost of the war raised from taxation was not greater than is proposed in the present bill.

Germany can not be used to the same degree for this purpose that other European countries can, because the policy of the Imperial German Government has been quite different from that of other nations. It is probably true that Germany has issued more bonds in proportion to the cost of the war than have other countries, but they have done so because Germany has maintained from the beginning, and does now—in fact, it has stimulated its own people with this declaration—that in the final analysis indemnities will be levied against the nations at war with the German Government, and the cost of the war will be paid by Germany's enemies. Therefore, instead of levying unusual taxes Germany has issued bonds, assuming that they will be paid by the conquered.

No other country engaged in this war has taken that position and not one of them would even suggest that such a course should be taken when hostilities cease. There are other and better methods of financing than forcing a crushed enemy to pay the cost of your own military operations. In France and England the situation is different. France has been peculiar for many years in its policy of distributing bonds among its people, even the poorer classes. They have been issued in small denominations, and in no other country in the world has there been anything like the large number of bondholders in proportion to the population as in France.

The same general result has been obtained in Great Britain; and while wealth must furnish the larger part of the money required in bond issues it can be demonstrated from the experience of France and England, and equally well demonstrated when the facts of our own experience are all known that directly and indirectly there is a very widespread interest in the bonds issued by the respective Governments. This may not be as apparent in the case of individuals as it is in an indirect way in the subscriptions made by corporations, savings banks, insurance companies, and other similar combinations. These subscriptions, while comparatively few in number, really represent tens of thousands of individuals. Especially is this true in the case of savings banks and insurance companies.

What I particularly wish to demonstrate is the fallacy of reaching a conclusion that it is safe or wise to take an excessive amount of surplus income at this time, making it, in effect, conscription. Those who advocate such a policy, it is true, will use England as an example and say that the amount of income taxes raised before the war was not over $250,000,000, and the amount to be raised this year will be a billion, but they must remember that that figure has been reached after three years of war and by a gradual process of extension of the law already in operation. In no case, however, has the income tax in England exceeded 35 per cent.

The income tax in France has not exceeded 10 per cent, and there is no income tax whatever in Canada. I want to call attention to what seems to be the far-seeing wisdom which is being displayed by our Canadian neighbors, a policy which will surely react on our prosperity after the war if we do not give it some consideration. Imposing no taxes on one side of the line and having an excessive, almost drastic income tax levied on the other will necessarily drive capital from the United States to Canada. There has been a very marked tendency to construct branch manufactories and even place original investments in Canada for manufacturing and other purposes during the last few years, and as surely as the time arrives, if we impose excessive and what I would term burdensome income taxes on our people while the Canadians do not impose any, we will find the tendency to follow this course will be very pronounced when the war ends.

Neither is it fair or sane to say that if a man has a million dollars income it is not confiscation for the Government to take one-half of it. Of course it is not confiscation which materially affects the individual. He will be the least concerned, or should be, if such a policy is followed, because he will certainly have enough to supply all of his needs and very much more; but it is the kind of confiscation which reacts on the general community and which is sometimes so obscure in its effect that it is difficult for the average person to understand why conditions are not satisfactory.

Who provided the hundred millions of dollars which was raised for the Red Cross? Was that done by the average citizen, or did it come from the surplus revenues of those who will pay the income taxes which will be imposed by this bill? Right in the midst of placing the liberty loan we were asked in that one way to give $100,000,000. Who provides the very large amounts of money given every year to educational and charitable institutions? Who has provided for the research investigations carried on by the various Rockefeller endowments? Those things can not be done unless there are large accumulations of capital, and they come as a result of these large accumulations.

I think I might as well put into the RECORD right here, Mr. President, some comments which I want to make on the question of new securities and gifts and donations. I am reading from the New International Yearbook of 1916, relating to gifts and bequests:

"The total amount of donations and bequests to charity, educational and religious institutions, art, music, and the public welfare in general in the United States during 1916 probably reached nearly $1,000,000,000. * * * The increases by corporations to employees in wages and bonuses amounted to nearly $400,000,00. Christmas charitable organizations and Good Fellows added about $80,000,000 to the grand total. * * * The donations and bequests for various purposes amounted to $764,000,000. These include only large sums which have been publicly announced. Of this total donations amounted to $623,000,000 and bequests to $140,815,000. To charities were given $657,000,000, to educational institutions $72,612,000, to religious institutions $20,000,000, to museums, art galleries, and municipal benefits $11,479,000, and to libraries $2,717,000."

Now I ask, considering that total, amounting to something like $2,000,000,000 for purposes which are beneficial to every community which is the recipient of a gift, what is going to happen if we take all the income of individuals and all the surplus earnings during this war from these educational, eleemosynary institutions, libraries, and schools? Where are they going to get the money to carry on their institutions? Already there is an amendment pending here asking that gifts be relieved from the provisions of the bill. Every educator is appealing to those who have been in the habit of giving not to withhold any considerable part of their usual gifts, and every educational institution is going to be embarrassed by this condition.

Then, again, we have a development policy in the United States. Every year a large part of the surplus earnings of the country goes into development. I wrote not long ago to a very well-posted bond man and asked for figures on the amount of securities issued in the United States last year. I received this letter in reply:

The total of bonds issued in 1916 was $853,000,000.
The total notes issued was $337,000,000.
The total of stock issued was $634,000,000.
The grand total new securities issued—stocks, bonds, and notes—was $1,864,000,000.

Of this total, $951,000,000 was represented by new securities of industrial companies; $542,000,000 was represented by securities of public-utilities corporations; and $371,000,000 represent new railroad securities.

Up to May 31 last there have been issued in 1917 a total in new securities of $945,575,000, divided as follows

In bonds	$417,000,000
In notes	293,000,000
In stock	234,000,000

There is, so far as I know, no definite measure ascertainable as to the amount of money raised by new securities which represent new capital raised.

I have for years used a rule of the same method which has been adopted by others in financial work with very satisfactory results, the gist of which is to regard 30 per cent of new securities issued as representing the financing of maturing obligations and 10 per cent as invested in fixed forms, leaving 60 per cent as additions to the aggregate working capital of corporations.

Applying this rule to the figures above quoted, it would mean that in 1916, approximately $1,302,000,000 was actually new money invested in corporation activities, of which $1,116,000,000 represented new working capital invested in the business and $187,000,000 new capital invested in fixed forms.

I ask the Senator from Wisconsin or any other Senator where is this money coming from to keep the public-service corporations of this country up to a reasonable standard to serve the public, or what is going to be done for money to add to the industrial activities of the United States. If we can not do those two things, then necessarily the public is not going to be well served by public-service corporations, and necessarily a great many men who would be employed in the additions which are built to industrial concerns will fail to obtain employment. In other words, if we take all this surplus revenue for the Government then there is none remaining for these very important matters.

This writer goes on to say:

On the same basis of computation, it would mean that an additional $661,000,000 has been invested either in fixed forms or in working capital in financing corporation activities in the first five months of 1917.

These figures here given are subject to modification for the purpose of your letter in that they represent par value in most instances. Where securities of no par value are issued, the offering price is used as the basis of computation, but in any event a reduction by 10 per cent to represent the bankers' underwriting profit, or the expenses of doing the business, would be ample, leaving 90 per cent of the amount above indicated as actually paid to the corporation.

I wish to bring to the attention of the Senate one or two instances of the receipts of money showing more conclusively that they come from surplus revenues. For instance, the Chicago University last year received in gifts from Mrs. George B. Eckels, $10,000; from the General Educational Board, for medical schools, $1,000,000; by La Verne W. Noyes, $190,000; by the Rockefeller Foundation, $1,000,000; by various donors, names not given, $1,000,000; by Mr. and Mrs. Julius Rosenwald, $500,000; by Hobart Williams, $2,500,000; a total of something like $7,000,000 from a comparatively few people who had evidently had surplus incomes, and therefore they were enabled to make these gifts. In other words, these great gifts which maintain our educational and similar institutions come from those who have accumulated a considerable surplus wealth, and in their passing, or, better still, during their lives they provide the means for making investigations, and for the education of the youth of the country.

Another and very substantial diversion of surplus earnings may be found in building construction each year. To indicate the extent of the requirements for this purpose I insert a table—it is a compilation made by the American Contractor—showing the building operations in 113 cities during the month of May, 1916 and 1917. There has been a falling off in building operations of about 35 per cent, which is one of the important results of the propaganda to economize, and it is also affected by the high cost of building material. The building trade of the country is one of our largest industries, and a reduction of 35 per cent in its volume is most important, because it necessarily means, or will eventually mean, the throwing of a very considerable number of men out of employment.

This particular table refers to but 113 cities, and applying to them alone it would indicate that the total capital required for this purpose in these cities for the year 1916 was $1,368,000,000. If the May rate continues during 1917, it will require for that purpose in these 113 cities $900,000,000; but this is not a large part of the total construction operation in the United States. I notice that in this list there are but nine Massachusetts cities. There are nearly four times that number in the State, several of more than 100,000 population, like Lowell, Somerville, and Cambridge, not included in the list, so that I think it would be safe to say that, while Boston is included in the list, building operations in other Massachusetts cities, without including towns, would be equal to the volume referred to in this list. The cities which are not included would double the amount of business done by those which are included. In other words, it is probable that the building operations of the country would be twice the amount indicated in this list, or at least $2,000,000,000 a year.

If all surplus earnings were to be taken for the purposes of the war, it would greatly embarrass such operations; in fact, it would practically destroy any activity along these lines. Considerable revenue would be obtained from those engaged in construction of this kind under the excess-profits tax and in other ways, and it is one of the pertinent examples of what will happen unless taxation is so laid that business will not be jeopardized; in fact, it should be so laid that business will be speeded up rather than reduced, as is indicated by the table, which I will insert without reading, if I have unanimous consent to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEWIS in the chair). If there is no objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WEEKS. Another important outlay which is a part of our annual expenditures relates to the purchase of new machinery and the repair or renewal of old machinery. Last year, according to the census reports, which are the best obtainable, we put about $2,000,000,000 into this one development or industry. Any action on the part of the Government which will lessen and especially stagnate the manufacturing interests of the country would necessarily reduce, if not practically destroy, this demand for new machinery. Hundreds of thousands of men are employed in this industry, so not only will their interests be affected but any probable increase in our capacity to supply the needs of the country would be prevented. A lessening in the supply of machinery in this country would be so far-reaching that its effect could not be estimated in dollars and cents; but this is simply another illustration of the necessity of keeping industries employed at their maximum capacity.

The reserves of the country not only go into these two important activities but into many others. It is impossible to give a complete list of them or of their importance from a monetary standpoint, but they are easily indicated by a study of the census report, and those to which I have made reference indicate that between six and eight billion dollars are expended for educational and eleemosynary purposes, for new machinery, for building purposes, and for the general purposes incident to those purposes. If we are going to take all the surplus revenue for the Government, of course every one of those industries and activities is going to languish.

It can not make any difference to a Rockefeller, who may have an income of $25,000,000 a year, whether he gives a quarter or a half or even three-quarters of his revenue to the Government. It makes a difference to others, and necessarily so. What does the man who has a surplus income do with it? Let us take the example of a man who has $100,000 income. I notice in the House debate it was stated that that is all the income which should be left to any individual. That statement was made by two or three speakers in general terms. What does a man with $100,000 of income do with that income? He may spend $25,000 of it for living expenses. Does he bury the other $75,000? If he did of course it would be extremely harmful to the community; but, as a matter of fact, he devotes that other $75,000 to the very purposes which I have been indicating. He invests some of it in the bonds, perhaps, of a public-service corporation, enabling that corporation to extend its line or improve its facilities. He may invest some of it in bank stocks, enabling the bank in the community where he lives to better serve the community by so doing. He may invest it in any one of the dozens of ways which may occur to any Senator, but as a matter of fact he does invest all of it in some form. He either buys securities, the net result of which is going to benefit the community, or else he gives the money to something or to somebody that will receive a measurable benefit from the gift, and therefore the Government, by taking the surplus money, simply prevents that individual from doing the things which he has done in the past.

As I said, it makes a vast difference to the community whether the beneficial uses to which that money is being put are continued or stopped. Moreover, if surplus incomes were not invested in eleemosynary ways, they would be invested in securities, which would result in building up the industrial and public-service corporations of the country. It is surplus income which makes such provisions, and without surplus incomes there would be an absolute stagnation in the construction of all those facilities which combine to keep our industrial life at the highest possible tension.

We should not levy taxation for the purpose of venting spite or prejudice against localities or enterprises or individuals, but to obtain revenue and at the same time keep every wheel turning at its full capacity; in other words, keeping everybody employed. In the final analysis, if the war is of any considerable length, that policy will in itself produce the greatest amount of revenue through excess war taxes and other similar ways.

Incidentally, while I have no brief to do so, I want to say a word for New York City and that section which is so generally the target of the unthinking and the envious. The reports seem to indicate that this community has subscribed for $800,000,000 of the liberty bonds just issued, or two-fifths of the entire issue placed. That is not because two-fifths of the wealth of the United States is located in New York City; it has not been done because of the attacks made on this particular community nor because any attention has been paid to the unthinking statements made when this bond issue was about to be placed that banks and bankers were not to be consulted; and it has not been because the people of New York City are any more patriotic than those of other parts of the country, or any less patriotic, but because there is located the financial heart of the United States. There is the concentrated capital; there is where the surplus earnings of the country gravitate, and that is the place where they are invested. There have been attempts in recent years, made in connection with the various investigations of the Money Trust and other foolish and irresponsible undertakings and declarations, to restrict what has been termed the "power of New York City," but it would be just as practicable to attempt to restrict within a limited space the flow of a mighty river or to make water run up hill as to divert by artificial means the trend of monetary transactions to New York. The envious and unthinking having failed to change this natural course, we find that those accumulations come to the rescue of the Government and provide now, as they will in the future, much more than New York's share of the cost of conducting this war.

The press is prone to criticize Congress for delay in passing war legislation, and yet few people would have believed five months ago that within that time war would be declared, legislation providing for the enrollment of 10,000,000 men would be enacted and the enrollment an accomplished fact; that a loan of three billions of dollars to the allies would have been made and partially paid; that a bond issue of two billions of dollars, bearing 3½ per cent interest, would be authorized and sold in this country; that all the deficiency revenue bills developing as a result of the war would have been promptly acted upon and become laws; that $500,000,000 would have been appropriated for the construction of ships, a large number of which have been contracted for; that $640,000,000 would be appropriated for aviation purposes; and that we would actually have troops in France on or near the firing line; all this in addition to passing food bills and much other legislation incident to the war—certainly a remarkable record. The consideration of all this legislation has not been tinged with partisanship, and in no respect nor for any reason has this legislation been unduly delayed.

I wish to repeat that, because it has been so frequently said that Congress has not been acting promptly, and so frequently has been the misstatement made that time is being wasted, for which reason the administration would be embarrassed by the action of Congress, and especially of the Senate. I do not believe there is a scintilla of evidence or fact to substantiate that statement.

We are now about to take practically the last step in laying the foundation for the prosecution of the war—providing for war taxation—and it is of vital importance that this step be most wisely taken, so sufficient revenues for the Government may be obtained without any material harm coming to the business of the country. Money must be obtained from those sources having surplus funds in cash, or practically so; it can not be obtained from surpluses invested in real estate or other property. Therefore it is essential that the plan adopted by the Senate Committee on Finance be incorporated in the bill; that is, to obtain the larger part of our needed revenues from incomes and excess war profits.

In this connection it may be well to call attention to the prevailing sentiment relative to prices and the possibilities which may result from unwise price fixing. Apparently those furnishing supplies to the Government are to be asked to do so with a small percentage of profit added to the actual cost of the goods. Lately it has been intimated that these prices should apply also to similar supplies furnished the allies, and that the general public should also be given the same price as the Government. Logically there is no reason why this should not be done. The Government is the public organized; the individual buyer is the public unorganized, and fundamentally there is no reason why the public organized should be given any preference over the public unorganized. Moreover, I am fearful of the sentiment which prevails relating to what is termed "profiteering." Why do men go into business? There is but one answer to that question—for the purpose of making profits. If they do not make profits, how can they support those dependent on them; how can they maintain establishments employing large numbers of our citizens unless there is a commensurate profit in proportion to the risks taken? If we are going to screw down the producer so that his profits are nominal, or even normal in war times, we must not only take the chance of destroying individual initiative and enterprise but if we do not do that we will certainly destroy the ability of such people to contribute to the expenses of the Government through income taxes and war-revenue taxes.

Very frequently we hear comments about excessive profits made by the United States Steel Co., and they are very large and I am willing to say excessive. But we are going to receive, according to the estimate I have recently seen, more than $125,000,000 of the $530,000,000, which it is estimated will be raised under the provisions of the bill from excessive war taxes, from the United States Steel Co. If the Government is going to compel the Steel Corporation to sell to the Government and to the allies and to individuals at a nominal price above cost, we are certainly going to lose the benefit of this large tax, and in addition we are going to lose any incentive on the part of the managers of such companies to extend and enlarge their business.

Moreover, we must be moderate in the amount of income we take, because substantially the same people who will pay this war taxation are the same ones who will subscribe most largely to the war loans and other activities connected with the war, like the Red Cross, and so forth. Then, when money is taken from these sources for taxation, for war loans, or for other similar purposes, it is not going to be available for use in the general improvements ordinarily connected with business activities. It can not be put into brick, stone, and mortar, or that kind of development; it can not go into the development of mines or other enterprises which give employment to labor. Our national wealth is not available for income purposes, our national wealth is invested in railroads, in mines, in manufacturing plants, and in all the multitudinous enterprises in which our people are engaged. Those things are not available for revenue purposes; only surpluses can be used for revenue, and, therefore, we are almost bound to limit ourselves in our taxation plan to one at least similar to that reported by the Finance Committee.

I think I ought to say, Mr. President, that many of the details of the bill worked out by the committee seem to me to be most satisfactory. I am not entirely in approval of all the features of the bill, and I have offered several amendments which I shall discuss later, but which I shall not take the time to discuss now. The Finance Committee is entitled to credit for having taken a proposition which I think was distinctly unsound and whipped it into shape so that it meets the approval of a large percentage of those who are familiar with the conditions. I want particularly to thank the chairman and the members of the committee for the care and patience which they have used in the consideration of the bill. I do not know what the experience of other Senators has been, but mine has been that any matter which I brought to the attention of any member of the Finance Committee has received his earnest and prompt attention, not always his favorable action, which, of course, was impossible; but certainly the members of the committee have tried to work out something which will meet the approval of Congress.

I have noticed statements made by those in very high authority to the effect that we would have no trouble in selling our bonds or in raising revenue because we had annually an increase in wealth of $50,000,000,000; but $50,000,000,000 does not represent our increase in wealth, it is the aggregate of the earnings of capital and labor combined. It is not an increase in wealth, it is a transferral of wealth, and the net increase may be only a small percentage of that amount. Naturally the larger part of this great sum is consumed in living expenses, and it is simply transferred from one hand to another.

In a word, the most important question connected with this laying of taxation is that relating to the conservation of the sources of revenue we will tap. If we do this wisely, we will be in position at the end of the war to effectively maintain our competition with foreign countries; but to do it wisely we must adopt the selective-draft system we have applied to the raising of an army; that is, we must draft from sources presumably less actively employed in all of the affairs of life, so that their expenditure will not be as keenly felt as would the expenditure of men of a different age. Presumably young men are not in as important employments or positions as those 10, or 20, or 30 years older, and therefore the draft applies to a limited age. In the same way the draft should be applied to limited sources for the revenue needed to finance the war, and I think, on the whole, the Senate committee has provided admirably for this purpose.

More important than any other reason against a policy of excessive taxation is that it will produce a hesitation or failure to undertake new ventures, for the Government will be taking revenue needed for other purposes and which usually goes to other activities. This would very quickly throw a cold blanket over the business activities of the country. The only immediate revenue that should be taken, in the final analysis, for the conduct of the war is that necessary for the normal governmental expenses and the surplus revenue not needed for extensions of business or the ordinary usual governmental, State, municipal, and charitable expenditures. When we take a penny beyond that amount we cripple something somewhere; and in the general adjustment that takes place, including the throwing of a man out of employment who can perform service where he has been employed better than elsewhere, we lessen the efficiency of our whole business structure.

Mr. President, during the discussion to-day the Senator from Wisconsin referred to the condition of the working man and the difficulty which he was having in making both ends meet. When there is a material increase in prices of commodities at any time somebody is pinched. Wages can not be raised in exactly the same ratio as other prices, exactly at the same time. If it were possible to do so, marking up wages as other products are marked up, at the same time, no harm would come to the working man or anyone else from an increase in the cost of living. The results of living are not the amount of money which a man receives for his employment but the net amount that he has at the end of the year. If that is a fair basis, it does not seem that the claims which are made that the laboring man is having an especially difficult time can be substantiated.

My judgment is that those who are living on small salaries, belonging to what we may term the "clerk class," are having infinitely more difficulty than are the men ordinarily classed as laborers. Labor has succeeded, and very properly so, in increasing its wages during the war as the cost of living has increased, at least in many cases. Other employees, like those of the clerk class, have not succeeded in doing so. So I think they are the worst sufferers.

I have referred, Mr. President, many times to the Massachusetts savings banks report, because I think those banks are the best indication of what the average laboring man in the United States is doing. I refer to Massachusetts simply as a type of all those States which have mutual savings banks, as the best indication that there is in the United States of what the average man is able to do at any definite time. The figures in the report made by those banks do not lie; they are the actual facts. In Massachusetts they particularly well represent the conditions because under our law a Massachusetts savings bank can only receive $1,600 from any one person. When the deposit of a person reaches $1,600 interest on the deposit stops.

Mr. GORE. In all of the banks?

Mr. WEEKS. In the savings banks.

Mr. GORE. But he may place an account in another bank?

Mr. WEEKS. Oh, yes.

Mr. President, Massachusetts has about 3,800,000 people; they are very largely interested in manufacturing industries; they live in urban communities. I think it is fair to say that probably nineteen-twentieths of the people of the State live in cities and towns of more than 2,500 people. Some of those communities are devoted exclusively to manufacturing industries.

Senators will recall that a few years ago there was a violent attack made on the management of the mills in the city of Lawrence. There were strikes which were accompanied by great disorders in that city. I think I ought to say that those strikes were fomented and carried on by the very same class of people who are now causing trouble in the Far West. Those strikes did not have the approval of the American Federation of Labor; they were opposed by that organization and by all other laboring men who really labor.

I should like to say here, Mr. President, in speaking of the labor question, that on the return of our mission to Russia recently they passed through Seattle, where there are in progress street car strikes and other strikes attended with considerable violence, which have completely tied up the transportation lines of both Seattle and Tacoma for two or three weeks. That agitation is backed by the Industrial Workers of the World and not by Federation of Labor. The situation was so serious that when our mission to Russia passed through Seattle Mr. James Duncan, the head of the Granite Cutters' Union, a member of the commission, and a resident of the city of Quincy, Mass., was asked to make an address defining his views from the labor standpoint of what should be done. Mr. Duncan is one of the vice presidents of the American Federation of Labor and his advice was exactly the advice which was given to our laboring people in this country by a party of Englishmen who came here this summer with the British mission; that was to stand pat on controversial matters until the war was over; that it was the duty of labor to aid the Government in every possible way; and that anything that related to a strike about a matter which was not of all importance was harmful rather than beneficial to the Government. I wish to state that because there has been an indication here to defend those men who have been instrumental in creating the disorders in the far West. My judgment is that not only are they not entitled to a defense from what may be termed capital, but that they are not entitled to it and do not get it from what is known as organized labor, the labor which really does do the work of the United States.

Now, to return to the city of Lawrence, which at present probably has a population of about 90,000. In the city of Lawrence there are three savings banks, and I want to give the condition of those banks as compared with last year. In the Broadway Savings Bank, where the deposits aggregate $5,100,000, the number of depositors increased last year by 650. There are 10,332 depositors in that bank and their average deposit is $493.62.

In the Essex Savings Bank of Lawrence—the largest savings bank in the city—the number of depositors is 29,783 and the average deposit is $454.61. The increase in the number of deposits last year was 1,954. The Essex Savings Bank has deposits aggregating $13,539,000.

The Lawrence Savings Bank, with deposits of $6,186,000, has 14,635 accounts averaging $422.73. The total increase of depositors in these three banks last year was 4,337; and in a total population of 90,000 in the city of Lawrence, which was dragged before the public as being a place where labor was not fairly remunerated, there are 55,000 persons having savings-bank deposits aggregating a total of more than $25,000,000, and averaging for each depositor more than $460.

We should do everything we can for real labor in this country; and that is what real labor is doing. It is what it did last year and what I assume it is doing this year; but the labor that is represented by the Industrial Workers of the World never does anything but harm, and I deprecate any man's standing on the floor of the Senate and defending the kind of outrages which are perpetrated by such people.

I instance the case of the Massachusetts savings banks because, as I said in the beginning, I think it demonstrates better than anything else the conditions which obtain in manufacturing communities in the United States. The sole industries in the city of Lawrence are woolen and cotton manufacturing.

I have here a page from the Boston Evening Transcript of recent date which indicates some of the activities in which communities have to engage—I should have introduced it at an earlier period—and to which those who have surplus incomes make contributions.

Here is a whole page [exhibiting] of what are termed "Practical and deserving charities that need the helping hand." Some of them have been in existence 100 years, like the Massachusetts Charitable Eye and Ear Infirmary, which "furnishes free medical attendance to the poor, saving the sight and hearing of many babies and adults every year. Last year it treated in the wards 3,646 patients, and there were 67,626 outvists. There is urgent need of increasing the work of the social-service department."

I could go on and read this whole list, but I will not bore the Senate by so doing. However, the Massachusetts Charitable Eye and Ear Infirmary is simply typical of the institutions referred to on this page, and it might be supplemented by many pages reciting similar activities which are carried on in the city of Boston—and Boston is not peculiar in that respect, for they are carried on in every community of any size—and which are maintained by the surplus revenues of those who have surplus revenues. If you take all of the earnings of our people for governmental purposes, what is going to happen to charitable institutions such as the one I have brought to your attention by way of illustration? Of course, they are going to stop their activities and a great many people are going to suffer as a result.

The Senator from Wisconsin quoted very freely from a group of economists, for at last there has been found a small group of economists who seem to think that all of the expenses incident to a war should be borne by the people who are actually doing the fighting at the time. I desire to make some comment on the statement that these economists have emitted. I am referring in such remarks as I make exactly to the same matter to which the Senator from Wisconsin referred to-day, and from which he read rather liberally.

It is contended by these economists that the policy they advocate will prevent the price inflation which may result from large bond issues; that it will increase the efficiency of the Nation, and that it is demanded by social justice.

Let us take the first of these contentions, that taxation will prevent price inflation. It is well known that the prices of many articles are much lower abroad than in the United States; yet our debt increase since the beginning of the war has been nominal, while the debt increases of European governments have been enormous. We have seen prices in the United States in many articles double and treble without any change whatever in our national indebtedness and without any material change in interest rates or any considerable change in our circulation.

Naturally, when business is greater than normal, bank loans are increased; in other words, credits are increased; but that condition has not been so pronounced in the United States that it has materially changed interest rates, which would be the result if credits had been extended beyond the ordinary capacity of the banks. Prices are not necessarily based on the inflation of credit, though they may be affected by it, and they are not necessarily affected by the amount of the circulating medium, though they may be affected somewhat by it: in fact, we assume that we now have a banking system which will regulate the circulating medium to the actual business needs of the country. I assert that there is no proof whatever that the present high level of prices in Europe and in America is primarily due to war bonds, as has been claimed, but, on the contrary, that it is primarily due to the question of supply and demand and to the speculation and greed which are always incident to war.

An illustration of the correctness of this conclusion is found in the following instance, perhaps as well as in any other: During the spring there was a strike among the fishermen sailing from Massachusetts ports. These fishermen supply the larger part of the fish used in the Atlantic coast section. Necessarily the price of fish advanced as a result of this strike. When it was adjusted the fishermen immediately went to sea, had good weather, and returned with a substantial catch, since which time fish on the Atlantic coast have sold at normal summer prices. We would naturally expect that sales might be at somewhat higher than the normal summer prices because of the additional cost of production. Wages and other conditions have changed, making the cost greater, but, as a matter of fact, the price of fish is normal. There are many other products too numerous to mention for which substantially the normal price only can be obtained.

If high prices were due to inflation, they would as effectively apply to fish, bananas, small fruits and vegetables, or any other products now bringing normal prices as to wheat and some other products which are relatively very high, simply because the demand has greatly exceeded the supply.

These economists further urge that the inflation of prices works a greater burden upon the wage earner and salary receiver than it does upon others. I will agree that it does place a greater burden on salary receivers, but I do not agree that it necessarily rests chiefly upon the wage earners. The statement of the Massachusetts savings-bank commissioner, made as of the year ending October 31, 1916, indicates that last year the deposits in the Massachusetts savings banks were twice as great as in any previous year in the history of the State. Those deposits come nearer representing the savings of the working people of a community than any other means of obtaining such information; and yet it would seem that, notwithstanding the high prices of the things they have to buy, that the mill workers, the laborers, and the people of small means in Massachusetts had twice as prosperous a year in 1916 as ever before, because prosperity is based on net results and not on large pay or large consumption cost. I have cited the Massachusetts savings-bank report as my basis for this conclusion.

These economists go on to claim that the bond policy increases bank credits and in that way produces inflation in prices. If a man purchases a Government bond and does not do so out of his surplus wealth, he will naturally have to borrow in order to pay for his purchase. He would have to do the same thing if he purchased any other kind of a bond, and he would have to do the same thing if he borrowed without furnishing collateral. In either case it increases bank credits. How does it add to the bank's credit to any greater extent if a man buys a thousand-dollar bond and borrows with that bond as collateral than it does if he pays a thousand-dollar tax and borrows the money from his bank with which to do so? The bank credit is increased in exactly the same amount and in exactly the same way; there is no escape from that conclusion; so if you tax individuals or corporations more than their surplus they will have to borrow of their banks—that is the only source of supply—and the bank credits will increase to whatever the borrowing necessity requires.

These advocates of extreme taxation go on to claim that if a man is giving up his money in taxes he would cease to compete with the Government and other buyers of the commodities of labor to the extent of the tax paid, but when the Government gives him a bond for his payment he is still enabled to compete to the extent of $800. They, in effect, urge that competition is not wholesome and desirable in business life, and that the only competition developed should be based entirely on cash transactions. If that were the case, the volume of business of the country would be so greatly reduced that the greatest hardship would result.

Moreover, purchasing a Government bond does not in any way differ from purchasing any other bond if the purchaser has not the entire purchase price; neither does it differ from any other transaction where credit is involved. Suppose a farmer finds it necessary to construct a new barn. Would it be wise for him to leave his stock and crops exposed until he had saved enough money to build the barn rather than use what surplus he has for that purpose and borrow the balance? Certainly it would not be businesslike either from his standpoint or from the standpoint of the community, and his failure to make a loan would lessen the food supply, would mean irreparable losses to himself, and would mean stagnation in ordinary business life.

These economists go on to say that it is likely that the Federal reserve banks will buy liberty and other Government bonds in a wholesale way by giving the Government checking accounts to the extent of the bonds. They should know that the Federal reserve banks can not buy any considerable quantities of these bonds and maintain the reserves, which they must do under the law.

There are many provisions in the law which are designed to keep the issue of notes within reasonable limits, including a reserve to be kept against them of 40 per cent in gold; but, in the final analysis, the issue is entirely within the control of the Federal Reserve Board, which may grant the request for them in whole or in part or reject it entirely.

Two or three months ago the Secretary of the Treasury wished to raise temporary funds to reimburse the Treasury, and he practically forced the Federal reserve banks to take $200,000,000 Treasury notes on a 2½ per cent basis. Of course, those notes could not be resold, because the rate of interest which they bore was materially below the market rate. The transaction reduced the reserves of the Federal reserve banks from 12 to 15 per cent. That illustrates, in itself, to what a small extent the Federal reserve banks could supply a market for Government bond issues. In other words, Mr. President, it would not be safe for the Federal reserve banks to invest a hundred million dollars in the liberty loan or any other issue of Government bonds if they proposed to hold them.

As a matter of fact, these Treasury notes should not have been sold to Federal reserve banks at all; neither should they buy other Government bonds, except under very unusual circumstances. It is the first province of the Federal reserve banks to supplement other banks, rediscount their short-term paper, and in other ways assist them when they require assistance but not to finance as an original proposition either the Government or anyone else. The slightest investigation of the operations of the Federal reserve banks will show the absolute fallacy of the suggestion that the Government could sell them bonds, enabling them to inflate their currency 100 per cent, because it does not give any consideration to the reserves which they must maintain.

One other point about the selling of a Government bond to a purchaser who will find it necessary to borrow, using it as collateral, is that there may be cases of this kind which will necessitate borrowing and possibly using these bonds as security, but that would not be a normal transaction, because the rate which liberty bonds carry is lower than the market rate for money. Therefore there would be no purpose in purchasing them and holding them to use as collateral when the borrowings would bear a higher rate than the 3½ per cent the bond carries. The prudent financier under such circumstances being able to sell his bonds at par would do so and save the difference in the interest rate.

Again it is claimed that having sold bonds to Federal reserve banks the Government might then draw on their bank accounts and, in order to pay such drafts, the banks would recoup themselves by retailing bonds to the public, leaving the inflation, it is claimed would exist, outstanding. It is difficult to follow this reasoning, and certainly it is not a practical operation which could be maintained because of the requirements of the law relative to reserves to be held by the Federal reserve banks and the reserves which are required against note issues. Those who make such contentions seem to have failed to notice these requirements and have come to their conclusion without giving them any consideration.

The second general contention that taxation is demanded by social justice seems to me to be especially untenable. It is claimed that it gives property a preference over life. If there were any basis for such a contention, it might have been made under the policy of the past; that is, when we depended entirely on volunteers for our military service, and when it was possible for a man of wealth to employ a substitute to fight for him, but certainly not under the democratic policy which has been established and on which the draft is based. Up to this time it has been true that a larger percentage of volunteers, as is always the case in the beginning of a war, come from the ranks of what might be termed the moneyed and highly educated classes than from any other source. More than half the students of many of our colleges have voluntarily gone into the service, and the slightest examination of the records will demonstrate that there has been no shifting of the burdens of this war from the rich to the poor or from any one class to another; but the question is asked, if it is right to draft men, why is it not right to draft money? That is exactly what we do when we impose taxes; but the way we impose those taxes is of vital concern to the Government and to the community and of much greater concern to them than it is to the individual taxed, assuming that he has independent resources.

Presumably, every citizen is sharing in the burden of the war, for taxes will be imposed to meet the requirements of the Government; and if we take the wise course this taxation will be so levied that no business will be harmed. It may be said that no tax can offset the chance the citizen takes with his life when he goes into the military service. That is true from the dollars and cents standpoint, but what kind of a life can it be that must have the consciousness for all time that it has failed to perform its national duty. We draft men of a certain age. It is the obligation of youth to fight our battles; it is the obligation of everyone to pay for the financial expense of the war in proportion to their ability, but there is no reason why that should be paid in one year or in five years; in fact, there is every reason why it should not be done. The soldiers and sailors of to-day are fighting for worldwide liberty, but the benefits they will gain will not only be enjoyed by those of the present day but by all future generations. Therefore, why should the man of to-day pay all the bills when the victory won by our soldiers and sailors will be of equal value to the man of to-morrow. The sailors of our Regular Navy do not believe in the contentions of these economists. They are in the service to fight and, if need be, sacrifice their lives that their country may live; and yet they did their bit in a financial way by subscribing to something like $3,000,000 of liberty bonds.

Incomes should be conscripted up to the requirements of the Government, it is true; but it is the height of folly to conscript it in such a way that the source of supply is dried up.

The third contention of those urging unusual taxation is that it will increase the world's efficiency. If they mean by this that it will prevent injustice to any considerable class, quite likely there is reason in that contention. But no particular class subscribes for bonds; indeed, there were more than three millions of people out of one hundred millions who subscribed to the liberty loan, and many who did not do so will subscribe for the next bond issue. And, after all, the payment of taxes, or at least the larger part of them, falls on relatively few people, and it makes no vital difference to them whether they are giving their surplus income to the Government or spending it for charitable or educational purposes or for the development of industries which will in turn increase the employment of labor. How can any argument be made to sustain such a position which will not apply with equal force in the case of issuing municipal bonds, State bonds, or corporation bonds? The money all comes from the same general source, it is true, and you may borrow in one community money which will be expended in another community in the same country; but all that indebtedness is held within the United States, and if a pay-as-you-go policy in this time of war is logical it would have been logical to have paid for the Panama Canal during its construction or paid for the Spanish-American War at the time it was fought or paid the Civil War requirements at the time, a course which would have been impossible in the latter case, or to pay for the building of the Erie Canal or for any of the multitude of other things which are requirements of civilization and are constructed by municipalities and local communities. Almost every community issues bonds with a sinking-fund requirement for the purpose of building schoolhouses. If a pay-as-you-go policy is a correct one, why do this? Why not wait until sufficient revenue has been provided before building the schoolhouse? The same reasoning will apply to waterworks, sewerage systems, and to various other forms of construction.

The theory loses sight of the fact that while the payment of the indebtedness comes from within our own borders in one case, it means a radical and violent change of credits, so radical and violent that it would destroy many industries. Our business system is so complicated and so interdependent that you can not destroy or injure any part of it without affecting the whole system; and if we try to produce from taxation ten or fifteen billions of dollars in one year, the amount we will probably spend and which we will have to raise by some means, it would be impossible to levy taxes in such a way that they will not bear with crushing weight on many occupations and industries, and the result would be a total financial collapse; indeed, it is hard for me to conceive that the small number of scientific men and small part of the press making these contentions have given any consideration to the experience of the world, our own experience in the United States in other wars, to our everyday policy of issuing bonds, or to the probable results of taking any such radical and unusual course.

I am in agreement, however, with the suggestion that a tax may properly be levied which takes a substantial part of special war profits; that there should be a material lowering of the present income-tax exemption and a high consumption tax on luxuries, if consumption taxes are to be levied.

Now, Mr. President, I want to take up a comparison of what has been done by other countries since the beginning of the war relative to taxation and bond issues, because, in my judgment, it will completely demonstrate that the Congress, in levying the taxes proposed under the pending bill, are going as far as they should in taxation this year.

The figures I intend to present to demonstrate my theory relative to the relation taxation should bear to bond issues in war expenditures are not strictly accurate, even in the countries with which we are in closest communication, and in some of the nations engaged in the war most of this information is unobtainable; but the evidence I can submit, it seems to me, is sufficient to conclusively show that any revenue over and above 25 per cent of the Nation's expenditures raised by the pending legislation will be in excess of the country's requirements, will be greater in proportion to the total amount which must be raised through bond issues and taxation than in any single year of our existence and greater than that raised by any country engaged in the war.

GREAT BRITAIN.

The nation with which we are most closely associated financially, and which furnishes the best example, in my judgment, of a correct system of war finance, is Great Britain. This country has not changed its well-known free-trade policy in any respect, notwithstanding the agitation in favor of doing so; but it has always obtained receipts at the customhouse and these receipts have substantially doubled since the beginning of the war; even under present conditions, however, they are comparatively a small part of the increased revenues which have been raised. Moreover, the proportional part of the cost of the war provided by taxation is greater in England than in any other country. This has been true in other wars. In those fought during the latter part of the eighteenth and early part of the nineteenth century, especially the Napoleonic wars, the expenditures produced by taxation were even greater in proportion to the total amounts raised than they are at the present time, this undoubtedly being due to the inability to float bond issues with the same readiness developed by the present generation and organization of business.

I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point a table showing the revenue raised by Great Britain each year since the beginning of the war, and also a table showing the increase in the bonded indebtedness during the same period.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. WEEKS. These tables indicate that the amount raised by taxation the first year of the war by Great Britain was, in round numbers, $793,000,000; in the second year, $921,000,000; in the third year, $1,411,000,000; this year, $2,501,000,000; and that the bond issues for these years aggregate almost exactly four times the amount raised by taxation in practically the same ratio each year. It is noticeable in this statement of revenue that while the customs receipts have exactly doubled, practically all of the additional increase in England's revenue has come from the income tax and the excess-profits tax, but that the income tax is not over 35 per cent in England even under present conditions.

If we applied what England is doing to-day, after three years of war, to our own conditions and expenditures, assuming that we will require $14,000,000,000 this year, it would mean raising three and a half billion dollars by taxation. But we raised under the ordinary laws which were on the statute books $1,330,000,000, in addition to which the post-office receipts—and they are included in the English figures—were $331,000,000, making a total of $1,660,000,000 from post-office receipts and ordinary sources of revenue. This bill, according to the estimates of the committee, will provide for something over $2,000,000,000. My judgment is that they have greatly underestimated the amount of money that will be received from the excess-profits war taxes and from the income tax, and that instead of raising $2,000,000,000 this bill, if it were passed in its present form, would raise nearer two and a half billion dollars. But even assuming that it raises only two billions, adding that to the one billion six hundred and sixty millions, we would have more than 25 per cent of the fourteen billions which it is supposed we are going to spend, or as much as England is raising in the third year of the war.

Earlier in my remarks I tried to point out why it was desirable to try to gradually increase this taxation instead of jumping into a system of taxation which might be applicable in two or three years.

Mr. President, I submit herewith a table showing the revenue collected by France during the calendar years 1914, 1915, and 1916, and other matters relating to the French financial system, which I ask to have printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

1916	32,635,943,250	6,297,737,047
1917	18,570,956,650	3,584,194,633
Total from Aug. 1, 1914, to June 30, 1917	82,909,973,326	16,001,624,851

Mr. WEEKS. The figures in this table which I have just presented demonstrate that the people of France have only been taxed about 14½ per cent of the total expenditures during the war. In other words, 85½ per cent of the required revenue has come from bond issues. If we limited ourselves to the same proportion of revenue obtained from taxation and it were assumed again that we would spend during the next fiscal year $14,000,000,000, we would only have to provide for the raising of $600,000,000 under the provisions of this bill.

One of the peculiarities of the taxation imposed by France, at least as compared with that imposed in Great Britain, may well be brought to the attention of the Senate. Direct taxes in France, on which England depends and on which we are to depend for the entire increase of our revenues, have not increased, relatively speaking, but have actually decreased in almost every item. On the other hand, the great importations into France, probably due to the destruction of so many of her industries located in the northern part of the country, have produced very largely increased revenues at the customhouse, so that for the year 1916 they were 75 per cent greater than the year before the war.

CANADA.

In Canada conditions are not very unlike our own; but it is quite apparent that Canada is looking to the future in the imposition of taxes, for it is receiving the larger part of its revenues from customs and excise dues; in fact, substantially all of its revenue, except that from the post office and government-owned railroads, has come from these sources. The total civil expenditures for the year 1916 were $130,350,726 and the revenues from taxes for that period were $172,147,838, leaving a surplus of very nearly $42,000,000. I wish to insert herewith a table showing the total debt of Canada, the net debt, and the interest paid.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

CANADA.

Debt and interest on debt.

Year.	Total debt.	Net debt.	Interest paid on debt.	Rate of interest on gross debt.
1913	$483,232,555.24	$314,301,625.68	$12,605,882.48	2.61
1914	544,391,368.86	335,996,850.14	12,893,504.95	2.37
1915	700,473,814.37	449,376,083.21	15,736,742.94	2.24
1916	943,839,433.92	615,156,171.02	21,421,584.86	.....

Mr. WEEKS. The Canadian gross debt increased during the year 1916 $243,355,618, and the total expenditures were that amount plus the civil expenses of the Government, which I have given. As the interest charges were between twenty-one and twenty-two millions, it would seem that the revenue raised in Canada was only sufficient to pay the civil expenses, the interest on the public debt, and about $20,000,000 in excess of that amount, or not very far from one-twelfth of the bonds issued.

If we provided for the civil expenses of the Government, as we have done, for the interest on the public debt, which will not be more than $230,000,000, estimating that the ten billions of bonds which may be issued are outstanding six months in the first year, and we raise an additional amount equal to one-twelfth of the ten billions we may need to raise, it would not be necessary to provide in the pending bill for more than $3,000,000,000 to make a showing comparable to that made by Canada in the third year of the war.

GERMANY.

Take the case of Germany. It is extremely difficult to obtain accurate information as to the expenditures or the taxation in Germany since the beginning of the war, but I submit herewith a table showing the estimated imperial budget for the years 1913, 1914, and 1915, the figures being given in marks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the table will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. WEEKS. This would seem to indicate, if the years given in the two tables I have submitted were the same, which is not true, and therefore the comparison can not be entirely accurate, nor have I information as to the beginning or end of the fiscal year of the Imperial German Government, that the proportional part of the expenditures of the Government raised by taxation were slightly less than 15 per cent. It will be noticed that the German policy is not very different from that followed in France in the relationship which the amount of money raised from taxation bears to the total expenditures.

The largest financial operations in which the United States has engaged up to this time, at least in proportion to the resources of the country, were those of the Civil War period, and while one can not take any particular pride in the results of the financial policy followed at that time, which I do not wish to discuss other than to say that the policy of the earlier days of the war was such that it brought about a condition which the better methods followed in the latter days of the war could not entirely correct; yet they may be some guide to what should be done at this time in imposing additional taxes. I am therefore submitting a table showing the ratio which the amount raised by taxation bore to the total expenditures for the years of the war.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the table will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Ratio of taxation to total expenditures during the Civil War.

	1862	1863	1864	1865
Total tax	$51,920,000	$112,680,000	$264,600,000	$333,700,000
Total expenditures	565,660,000	899,810,000	1,295,540,000	1,906,430,000
Ratio of taxation to expenditures (per cent)	9.17	12.52	20.42	17.50

Mr. WEEKS. It will be noticed that the highest proportion of revenue to expenditures was 20.42 per cent. If we are to raise fourteen billions this year, and 20.42 per cent of that is to come from taxation, it would only be necessary to provide about $1,400,000,000 in this act.

No criticism was made of the issuing of the Spanish War loan at the time of the Spanish-American War; and, by the way, we have recently, by almost unanimous vote of the Senate, renewed $68,000,000 of Spanish War bonds, which had been running 20 years, for a further period of 50 years. Neither was there any particular criticism of issuing bonds to pay for the Panama Canal, although under the policies of the administrations of Presidents Roosevelt and Taft the canal was practically built out of surplus revenues; and especially was there no protest made against issuing these bonds by those who are now advocating raising the major part if not the entire cost of the war from taxation. If there is any logic in the manner of issuing Spanish War loans or Panama Canal bonds or any of the municipal and State bonds to which I have referred in my remarks before, there certainly is logic in issuing bonds for at least as large a proportion of our present war costs as are so raised by Great Britain.

There is one point about the taxation of Great Britain, which I did not include when I was referring to that nation, which I should like to put in the RECORD. As I have stated, Great Britain is a nation which we may very properly follow in imposing a system of taxes, because they have had wide experience in imposing taxes under war conditions. It is particularly noticeable that the taxes which they imposed in the earlier days of the war were very moderate compared with those which are being imposed to-day. Some who advocate the course proposed by the minority in this matter argue that because Great Britain is taking 80 per cent of the excess profits or war profits for taxation purposes we should do so at once. I have already called attention to the undesirability of jumping into the same position which has finally been reached by a country having wide experience in such matters and which it has required three years to reach.

We should take the opportunity of partially adjusting ourselves to war conditions before we impose the additional taxes which we may have to impose if the war continues. Our trade with the countries with which we are now at war ceased at least two years ago, or practically so, and we have been carrying on our trade with other foreign countries under war conditions; so we are ready for a higher rate of taxation, if it is necessary, than that imposed by European countries at the beginning of the war.

The income tax and the excess-profits tax, as I have stated, are the main reliance of the British taxation systems. In the case of the former, only those having less income than $650 are exempt, and that is one point in this bill which I particularly commend—that the basis has been made, in my judgment, a proper one, not only from the standpoint of the revenue, but from the standpoint of the distribution of the burdens of government among the people of the country. Nothing will be brought to the attention of Congress or of an administration any quicker than the imposition of a tax among a very large class of people if they feel that it is a direct tax and that it is being unjustly levied. But Great Britain has abatements which are not included in the present bill and which I think might well be given consideration by the Finance Committee, relating to the number of children, although I am not sure but that that has been included now in the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. That has been included in the bill, allowing $200 for each dependent child.

Mr. WEEKS. I think that is a very wise action.

It is well worth noting that the English rate of taxation on incomes—and it is my judgment that in this respect the English policy is preferable to the one proposed in the legislation which we are considering—differentiates between an earned income and an unearned income. The lowest rate of tax on an earned income in Great Britain is 11¼ per cent on incomes less than £500. The tax on unearned incomes of the same amount is 17½ per cent. It seems to me particularly fair and desirable that there should be a differentiation between an earned income and an inherited income.

I do not at this time want to take any more of the attention of the Senate. I have some other matters which I shall want to bring to the attention of the Senate when the amendments which I have introduced to the bill are in order for consideration; but I am confident that after five hours of talk the Senate will be glad to be relieved of any further discussion.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk to the income-tax title of the pending bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, after line 3, it is proposed to strike out the remainder of the section and to insert:

> Thirty-five per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $500,000 and does not exceed $750,000.
> Forty-five per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $750,000 and does not exceed $1,000,000.
> Fifty per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $1,000,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand that the Senator from Rhode Island asks to tender the amendment for action at this time?

Mr. GERRY. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is that agreeable to the chairman of the committee?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is entirely agreeable to me. I do not think we should vote upon the amendment this afternoon, because there are few Senators present, and I think there was a general understanding that we would not vote upon the amendments to these sections until to-morrow. For that reason I will now ask that the bill be temporarily laid aside, with the understanding that this will be the pending amendment when the bill is taken up to-morrow.

Mr. GERRY. That is entirely satisfactory to me, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the revenue bill will be temporarily laid aside, with the understanding that the amendment tendered by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] will be in order to-morrow morning.

EXPORTATION OF COTTON.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, some days ago the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] had incorporated in the RECORD a statement intimating that cotton was finding its way to Germany and quoting figures to show that certain neutral countries were receiving in excess of their prewar receipts. I took occasion to investigate this matter to find out whether or not my section of the country, producing the world's supply of cotton, was unconsciously contributing to the supplying of munitions to Germany. Of course I have no way of knowing, any more than the Senator from Massachusetts has, whether or not cotton is finding its way from certain neutral countries to Germany; but what I do know is that the figures quoted by him are entirely wrong and misleading. They emanate from a source that would cause suspicion to be attached to them, because they emanate from the great mill center of New England, and cotton is high; and I do not think it comes with good grace to have incorporated in the RECORD certain insinuations that are not borne out by the facts.

Now, Mr. President, I am going to quote to you——

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, before the Senator gets away from that point, I will state that I shall want to make some comments about what he is saying now; but I should like to ask him at this point why he considers it a subject of suspicion that manufacturers who may be located in New England have brought to the attention of the Government the fact that cotton seems to be going into enemy territory?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I just want to show that it does not seem to be going there. That is what I am after; and I also want to show——

Mr. WEEKS. But the Senator reflected on those who are supposed to have prepared these figures. I did not submit the figures; my colleague did; but the Senator seemed to reflect on the origin of those figures, or the makers of those figures.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes; because there is a reflection on the section where the cotton originates. The South no more wants high-priced cotton at the expense of the honor of America than New England.

Mr. WEEKS. But, Mr. President, this is not a question of high-priced cotton. This is a question of the destination of the cotton.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No, no; the insinuation was that the high price offered was the inducement. Now, Mr. President, I want to call attention to the figures.

Prior to 1914–15, before demoralization had disrupted all the channels of commerce to the great German port of Bremen 3,000,000 American bales were exported. That was a distributing point. She redistributed to the Netherlands, to Holland, Sweden, Norway, and Denmark, and it did not appear in the exportation from this country to those countries.

The first effect of the war was to close the great cotton port of Bremen. Hence on account of the tremendous crop made in 1914, the largest crop on record in the history of America, when we made 16,000,000 bales of cotton, there were bankruptcy and ruin threatened to certain cotton growers in this country. England had not at that time declared cotton contraband and we were seeking any port through which we could get the surplus cotton abroad. Hence some of these ports that did not appear in the record before as receiving any great amount of cotton for those years did receive what seemed to be an astonishing amount; but from the cotton year of 1914–15, which means from August 1, 1914, to August 1, 1915, these lesser ports did receive an unusually large amount of cotton. From August 1, 1915, to August 1, 1916, there was still a large exportation, but to these minor points it was diminished. From August 1, 1916, to August 1, 1917, the present cotton year, these very ports received nothing above the normal and in some cases below the normal of the prewar receipts.

I wish to put in the RECORD the actual figures furnished me by the Census Bureau, showing the exportation of American cotton to the ports complained of from August 1, 1916, to August 1, 1917. England received 2,793,385 bales against a normal of 3,500,000 bales.

Let me say in passing that Liverpool was a great port to which we exported cotton and from which was reexported cotton to the smaller nations, and those smaller ports did not appear in our tables of exportation. With the difficulty of getting cotton into Liverpool it is reasonable to suppose that the amount of cotton received by these minor ports was greater than appeared in the prewar or the ante bellum exportation notice in our tables from America.

So England received this year 2,793,388 bales against a normal of only 3,500,000. France received this year 1,023,127 bales against a normal of 1,023,000 bales. So France received this year exactly what she received in the prewar time.

Italy received 660,571 bales against a normal of 636,000 bales, which was just about the prewar receipts. Italy was one of the countries that answered the statement put in the RECORD by the Senator from Massachusetts by saying it was preposterous to think that she would import cotton for the purpose of selling it to Austria-Hungary to be converted into powder to shoot her own soldiers with. I clipped the statement of the ambassador, and thought I had it among my papers to incorporate into my remarks. I have it not, but I will at a later time put it in the RECORD as evidence showing how they feel in reference to this matter.

Spain received this year 366,263 bales, against a normal of about the same amount.

Russia received 46,556 bales, against a prewar receipt of 112,262 bales.

The Netherlands received 59,092 bales this year, against a normal of about 35,000 bales.

All other countries of Europe received 173,679 bales, against a prewar receipt of 83,821 bales.

Canada is just normal; Mexico about normal. All other countries received 118,071 bales against 145,000 bales prewar receipts, showing total receipts in Europe of something like 4,000,000 less than the prewar receipts, for the reason that Germany before the war broke out had a normal importation of 3,000,000 bales of cotton. She, of course, according to these tables received none, and Austria-Hungary, which had received about a half-million bales, of course received none.

Now, Mr. President, the milk in this coconut can be given according to the statement of Mr. Rogers, of the Census Bureau. I quote his exact words in his communication to me transmitting these figures:

> The world's production of commercial cotton, exclusive of linters, grown in 1916, as compiled from published reports, documents, and correspondence, was approximately 18,365,000 bales of 500 pounds net, while the consumption of cotton (exclusive of linters in the United States) for the year ending July 31, 1916, was approximately 21,011,000 bales of 500 pounds net. The total number of producing cotton spindles, both active and idle, is about 148,500,000.

In other words, the consumption of American cotton has outstripped production in the period indicated 3,00,000 bales; that is, we have consumed the surplus, because in 1915 we only made 11,060,000 bales, and in 1916 11,360,000 bales, while during these two years the consumption of American cotton was approximately 14,000,000 bales each year. So the surplus carried over from 1913–14 has been consumed in 1915–16 until the world is face to face with a cotton famine. There is not much more than a normal supply for America and her allies, and as her allies are easier to reach and there is a greater incentive to give it to them the statistics show that they are getting it hardly normal.

In addition to that, for the first time in the history of America we are manufacturing in the cotton-growing States and in the North approximately 7,000,000 bales of cotton. The exact figures are 6,801,188 bales. The cotton States are converting 3,901,413 bales annually; all the other States 2,899,775 bales, making a total approximately of 7,000,000 bales.

Our exports to Europe before the war were 11,000,000 bales, as many bales as we made in 1915. Our exports to Europe from August 1, 1916, to August 1, 1917, were 5,739,129 bales, a falling off of 5,000,000 bales since the war began.

Mr. President, I have put these figures in the RECORD to show that the neutrals are not getting at the present time as much cotton as they got before the war. With all the demand for textiles, with the high price that is now existing, what incentive would there be for them to risk the dangers incident to getting contraband into Germany when the price that they can get outside of Germany shows a splendid profit?

We all know that the difference between the price of the raw material and the finished product is the margin of profit. I have heard no man here indicate that cotton manufactured goods were being smuggled into Germany. Yet in spite of the fact that cotton is twice as high as it has been since 1868–69, and the mills of the North and the South are paying from 25 to 27 cents a pound for their cotton, they have declared the largest dividends in the history of cotton mills. The price of cotton is high, but the price of the finished product has gone beyond any reason. Some mills of the South, I have been informed, are declaring 100 per cent dividends and paying 27 cents a pound for cotton.

I think it is in the RECORD, placed there by the Senator from Massachusetts, that it cost but 10 cents a pound to grow a pound of cotton. We do not count in estimating the cost of a pound of cotton the education of the family, of those who produce it, the depreciation in farm implements, the necessary interest on their land, and, above all, a living wage for those who produce it. We do not speak of the overhead charges in relation to the farm as we do in relation to manufacturing concerns. We take it for granted that the average cotton producer must be satisfied with a few scanty clothes and his food. Nothing is reckoned for schools, for comfortable homes, for an investment to enlarge his acres and to improve them. He must be satisfied with the actual skeleton of cost. How much fertilizer did he put in the ground? How much did he pay? How much did it cost to work it? How much did it cost to gather it; how much did it cost him in absolute dollars and cents to put it on the platform f. o. b. without any reference to the things that go to make the ordinary charges in reference to other business?

Mr. President, I want to say in conclusion that as a cotton grower of the South I would be willing to see every cotton seed destroyed during the time of this war if I thought that by the growing of cotton we could furnish our enemies with the munitions of war to inflict death upon the American troops who are going to vindicate our flag and the honor and right of our country to haul our cotton on the high seas, because the thing that actuated me more than any other to vote for war was because the Imperial German Government assumed the right to deny the open seas to the American flag and to the American people. But if the growing of cotton and the selling of it even in American markets meant that it could reach Germany, there is not a true American cotton grower who would not be willing to forego the planting and sale of cotton notwithstanding what it means to the South.

In answer to these insinuations that this is a time for the South to show her patriotism I say she will show it, and whenever it is proven that cotton goes to Germany she will take the initiative and ask for an embargo.

I have submitted these figures to show that there is no reason to believe that cotton is reaching Germany, and until that is done, whenever we ascertain that production is being used to our destruction, it is time enough for us to act. Take the exportation during the period I have called attention to, and take the present situation, which is that there are 4,000,000 bales less being exported now than there were during the early stages of the war and the prewar period.

The fact of the business is that there is a famine in cotton, and let alone the law of supply and demand within the neutral countries and America and the allies would justify a much higher price than is now obtained, and the price of textiles made out of it now justifies a much higher price than is being paid to the man who produces it.

If this question is discussed further, I shall bring in the price list of certain cotton articles and weigh them pound for pound and compare the cost of conversion from the raw cotton to the finished product and show the profit that the mills are getting, both north and south.

I am a little afraid that some gentlemen are so very anxious about the honor of the section they do not belong to that they would like to have that section contribute a little more to the fat profits they are getting.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I suppose the Senator from South Carolina was referring to something that was put in the RECORD by my colleague. I did not happen to see it, and I do not know exactly what it was. But I am familiar with the general line of complaint that was made in that particular insertion, and I shall say to the Senator from South Carolina, who seems to be supersensitive on the subject of cotton whenever anybody refers to cotton, that it had nothing whatever to do, in my judgment, with the price of cotton or whether the southern planter should receive more for his cotton or was receiving too much for it. It simply brought to the attention of the State Department or the administration the fact that apparently more cotton was going to Geneva and to Rotterdam than was sent there in normal times and more than the mills which were tributary to those ports ordinarily used.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I understand that, Mr. President.

Mr. WEEKS. That was the whole purpose.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I understand that; and the Senator is repeating the same very beautiful, plausible argument that we ought then to place an embargo on cotton, to confine its export to one or two ports, and allow the American mills to get it all.

Mr. WEEKS. Well, Mr. President, I should be glad to see the American mills manufacture every pound of cotton that is produced in the United States; but that is not the question. The question is whether we are furnishing cotton by some indirect method, some indirect course, for our enemies to make munitions to use against our men.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. All right.

Mr. WEEKS. That is the only question that has been raised.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That is all right; and it was as to that question that I was attempting to show there was no basis for the charge, because there is not being exported from America any more cotton than the countries complained of received before the war. Furthermore, about 4,000,000 bales less are exported than were exported before the war.

What I was complaining of, however——

Mr. WEEKS rose.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator will allow me just a moment—was that this clamor comes from the center of the cotton-manufacturing industry. What would be the result if the State Department should become alarmed, or if they had just reason to believe that cotton was being sent to Germany? They would then place an embargo on its exportation to certain places, thereby preventing the export of cotton. That would increase the domestic supply and decrease the price of cotton, but it would not affect the price of manufactured goods. That is the milk in this coconut.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I do not think there is any milk at all in the coconut to which the Senator from South Carolina has been referring.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I hope there is not.

Mr. WEEKS. I want to ask the Senator if it is not true that more cotton has gone into the port of Genoa during the last year or two years than ever before?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I have not before me the figures for that port; the reporter has the table; but——

Mr. WEEKS. Then I will excuse the Senator from answering that question, and ask if there is more cotton going into that port than heretofore, where is it going?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I want to state that only 24,000 bales of cotton more than the prewar requisite have gone into all the ports and receiving stations of Italy. What would 24,000 bales of cotton amount to when—and I suppose the Senator is as informed, confidentially, as I am—we consider the amount of cotton it takes to manufacture explosives for one shell?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the only purpose of raising this question at any time has been the fear that by some means some American cotton was getting into the hands of our enemies. If the Senator from South Carolina can dispel that fear, then he may remove any doubt which exists in his mind about somebody making a little more or a little less money on the domestic manufacture of cotton.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Let me ask the Senator a question. He stated a moment ago—and that was the basis of the statement of his colleague—that more cotton had gone into certain ports than ever before——

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; and I named the ports.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Exactly, and I can name some other ports where in 1914–15 and in 1915–16 more cotton went than previously but where in 1916–17 there did not go as much. We were trying to export cotton to Germany before we declared war in April. There was no crime or sin about that. We were doing our best to get cotton there and were sending it by every hook or crook; but since we have declared war, and for four months antedating our declaration of war, the exportations dropped off below the normal to the neutral countries. Those are the figures which I have put in the RECORD and which have been received from the Census Department and the Agricultural Department.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not want to prolong this discussion, Mr. President, but the Senator from South Carolina has hardly answered my question. I hope he will take the trouble to investigate the question as to whether or not more cotton has gone into Genoa than in other years; and if so, where that cotton has gone.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I answer the question by saying that only 24,000 bales in excess of the prewar amount have gone into all Italy.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WEEKS. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will permit me, I desire to say that last year the exports of cotton were not larger or perceptibly larger than they were prior to the war. The demand has been greater in Italy, because Italy has made part of her own munitions. Prior to the Italian declaration of war, shipped through Genoa into Austria. I personally had knowledge of such shipments and know they were going on; but I do and prior perhaps to 1916, there was a vast amount of cotton believe, eliminating the years prior to Italy's entering the war and coming down to more recent time, it will not be found that such exports have been larger.

I do not believe the Senator from Massachusetts would seek to press the proposition solely to injure cotton or solely to help the mills.

Mr. WEEKS. Of course that is not my purpose.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not believe that it is, and I am only making this statement to call his attention to what my own investigation of the facts leads me to conclude. I believe that a confusion in these figures has grown out of the fact that it is absolutely true that in the winter of 1914–15 we shipped from the United States nearly 3,000,000 bales of cotton to Germany through Genoa, through Holland, through Denmark, through Norway, and direct to Bremen. I believe that by separating the years and considering the last 6 or 12 months disconnected with prior years it will be found that there is no cotton going to Germany now; and, so far as I have been able to find out, I am satisfied none is going there now.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the figures that were furnished me indicated that more cotton was going to Genoa than ever before. I sent the figures to the State Department and asked for an investigation, and I assume that the motive which moved my colleague in putting these figures into the RECORD was the same as is mine. We do not care anything about the price of cotton or of cotton goods, but we do care if cotton of American production is getting into the hands of our enemies.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Before this matter is concluded I want to read into the RECORD what the Italian ambassador has said about the very point made by the Senator from Massachusetts. His statement is as follows:

The Italian ambassador has authorized an emphatic and sweeping denial of published reports that large quantities of American cotton are finding their way across the Italian borders into Austria. He states that there is not the slightest foundation for any such charge, which appears to be based entirely upon the fact that the importations of American cotton into Italy have greatly increased in the past year.

The ambassador explains this increase as due to the demands of the Italian Army and Navy, which are using all this cotton for the manufacture of smokeless powder or cloths for uniforms for the men.

All of the Italian factories not engaged in the manufacture of war material or that absolutely required for the maintenance of the civil population have been closed in order that every energy and resource may be concentrated on strengthening the military and naval forces. The ambassador says that it is absurd to suppose that the Government would permit cotton to go to the enemy to be made into powder to kill Italian soldiers.

AIR STATION SITE FOR THE NAVY.

Mr. SIMMONS obtained the floor.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2437) to provide for the acquisition of an air-station site for the United States Navy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill named by him. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with amendments, on page 2, line 1, after the word "acres," to insert "or such enlarged area for which he may be able to contract within the appropriation"; and in line 6, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$175,000" and to insert "$150,000: Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy shall authorize the payment of no part of this sum, except for perfecting the title and dredging Cold Spring Harbor and the entrance thereto, in order to make it more available for naval purposes: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, empowered in his discretion to acquire, if possible, additional acreage without increased cost, and to exact guarantees for the maintenance of the electric railway now running through the above-described land; and power is hereby conferred upon the Secretary of the Navy to condemn land for naval, aviation, and kindred purposes on the New Jersey coast adjacent to Cold Spring Harbor; and the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed, in conducting his negotiations with the Cape May Real Estate Co., to maintain intact the obligation existing between the United States and the Cape May Real Estate Co., executed by the said company June 25, 1917; and that this contract shall not be regarded as a waiver of either the obligation of the company or the rights of the United States," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to acquire, by purchase or condemnation, including all easements, riparian and other rights appurtenant thereto, for use for naval purposes, the tract of land situate at Cape May, N. J., lying between Princeton and Kansas Avenues and the water front and Cape May Avenue, comprising, exclusive of Pennsylvania Avenue, which intersects the tract and is to remain a public thoroughfare, approximately 57.73 acres, or such enlarged area for which he may be able to contract within the appropriation, and there is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the acquisition of said property and of all easements, riparian and other rights appurtenant thereto, the sum of $150,000: Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy shall authorize the payment of no part of this sum, except for perfecting the title and dredging Cold Spring Harbor and the entrance thereto, in order to make it more available for naval purposes: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, empowered in his discretion to acquire, if possible, additional acreage without increased cost, and to exact guarantees for the maintenance of the electric railway now running through the above-described land; and power is hereby conferred upon the Secretary of the Navy to condemn land for naval, aviation, and kindred purposes on the New Jersey coast adjacent to Cold Spring Harbor; and the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed, in conducting his negotiations with the Cape May Real Estate Co., to maintain intact the obligation existing between the United States and the Cape May Real Estate Co., executed by the said company June 25, 1907; and that this contract shall not be regarded as a waiver of either the obligation of the company or the rights of the United States.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator if the bill has been recommended by the department?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It has been recommended by the department; the Secretary of the Navy has written a letter to the Naval Affairs Committee requesting the passage of the bill. The measure has been considered by the Committee on Naval Affairs, and a subcommittee have inspected the ground, have approved the location, and have made a favorable report.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understood that the Navy Department was probably making investigations in various portions of the country for the purpose of establishing aviation stations, but I did not know that they had selected this site for any particular reason for what they call an "air station."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. They have not only selected this site, but they have a great deal of their equipment and material already on the ground; a marine station has been established there, and I think about 200 naval reserves are also there at the present time.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have no objection to the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RECESS.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m., Tuesday, August 21, 1917) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, August 22, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, August 21, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who art ever ready to hear the prayers of those who seek Thee in faith and confidence, hasten the day, we beseech Thee, when pure and undefiled religion may find its way into every heart, when men of all climes and of all creeds shall worship Thee as Father, that brotherly love shall reign supreme, that the prophecy of old may be fulfilled, when "He will judge between the nations and will decide concerning many peoples; and they shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more"; that the peace which passeth understanding may fill all hearts; in Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, August 17, 1917, was read and approved.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the bill (S. 2477) to authorize the construction of a building for the use of the Treasury Department was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until Friday, August 24, 1917, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, reports on preliminary examination and survey of artificial waterway from Lake Erie, at or near Toledo, Ohio, to the southerly end of Lake Michigan by way of Maumee River and the city of Fort Wayne, Ind., or other practicable route (H. Doc. No. 343); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication of the Secretary of War, submitting a clause for inclusion in the pending deficiency appropriation bill (H. Doc. No. 344); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication of the Secretary of the Interior, submitting estimates of appropriations for the service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918 (H. Doc. No. 345); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. GORDON: A bill (H. R. 5818) for the relief of Cuyahoga and Hamilton Counties, Ohio, by payment of fees due said counties for the custody of Federal prisoners in the county jail; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. COPLEY: A bill (H. R. 5819) granting the consent of Congress to the city of Elgin, Ill., to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Fox River at Elgin; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. ANTHONY: A bill (H. R. 5820) to provide for the award of medals of honor and distinguished-service medals; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. LUNDEEN: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 143) directing the President to seize sufficient coal supplies for home consumption; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. AYRES: A bill (H. R. 5821) granting an increase of pension to George H. Kimball; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GORDON: A bill (H. R. 5822) granting a pension to Edward V. Andrews; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KETTNER: A bill (H. R. 5823) for the relief of George H. Finnegan; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. ANTHONY: Petition of Rev. Charles M. Sheldon and other citizens of Topeka, Kans., for legislation to prohibit use of food products in manufacture of intoxicating liquor; to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, petition of Lillian Lewis and other citizens of Horton, Kans., for national prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CARY: Petition of the Progressive Farmer Co., Birmingham, Ala., opposing the adoption of the zone system; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of the Wisconsin Association of Optometrists, urging the passage of the standard-price bills, House bills 212 and 44; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, petition of the Sprague Publishing Co., Detroit, Mich., opposing the tax on second-class matter as proposed in the war-revenue bill; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of B. Loewenbach & Sons Co. (Inc.), Milwaukee, Wis., protesting against the provisions of the war-revenue bill which tax mailed catalogues, booklets, pamphlets, etc.; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of the Wisconsin Humane Society, Milwaukee, Wis., urging that Societies for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children and organizations engaged in animal protection be exempted from the operations of the war-revenue bill; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of the Litchfield Manufacturing Co., Waterloo, Iowa, in re the excess-profits tax; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. DARROW: Resolutions of Tiogo Tribe, No. 358; Wawatam Tribe, No. 63; Mohave Tribe, No. 320; Teocco Tribe, No. 343; Seminole Tribe, No. 30; Minonk Tribe, No. 451; and Tonawanda Tribe, No. 81, Improved Order of Red Men; Windom Council, No. 93, Sons and Daughters of Liberty; Resolution Council, No. 6, Fraternal Patriotic Americans, all of Philadelphia, Pa., in behalf of Senate joint resolution 84; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. FOSS: Petition of the William McKinley Camp, No. 12, Department of Illinois, United Spanish War Veterans, urging that aliens be made subject to the draft law; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. GRIEST: Petition of Otto H. Lehman, Lancaster, Pa., favoring the exchange of censored news between parties living in the United States and those within the territory of the central powers; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, petition of John G. Zook, Lititz, Pa., urging the conscription of incomes above $3,000 per year; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of General Cameron Council, No. 851, Mount Joy, Fraternal Patriotic Americans; Tangascootac Tribe, No. 215, Christiana, Improved Order of Red Men; Otsego Tribe, No. 59, Mount Joy, Improved Order of Red Men; Marietta Tribe, No. 292, Improved Order of Red Men; Manheim Council, No. 32, Order of Independent Americans; Mountville Council, No. 65, Fraternal Patriotic Americans; Tribe No. 65, Conestoga, Improved Order of Red Men; Conestoga Council, No. 22, Lancaster, Order of Independent Americans; Canassatego Tribe, No. 203, Lancaster, Improved Order of Red Men, all of Pennsylvania, favoring the enactment of Senate joint resolution 84, authorizing the drafting of aliens into the military service of the United States; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SCULLY: Petition of the Home Defense League of Perth Amboy, N. J., favoring the drafting of aliens; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, petition of the Interstate Sportsmen's Protective Association, headquarters Kansas City, Mo., protesting against the passage of the pending migratory-bird treaty act; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petition of the New Jersey State Dental Society, urging the passage of such a bill as will modify the status of the Dental Corps of the United States Army as to increase the efficiency of the dental service to the Government; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, petition of New Jersey Branch National Woman's Party, Newark, N. J., urging the immediate passage of the Susan B. Anthony Federal suffrage amendment as a war measure; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition of the National Council Junior Order of United American Mechanics, in national session, urging a restriction of immigration; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

Also, petition of the New Jersey State Bar Association, favoring an increase of the salary of Federal judges; to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. SIMS: Petition of sundry citizens of Decatur County, Tenn., urging the repeal of the conscription law; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, August 22, 1917.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, August 15, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

EXPORTATION OF COTTON.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I desire to present and ask the Secretary to read a memorial of the House of Representatives of the Georgia Legislature respecting the proposed embargo on cotton. After it is read I desire to say just a word about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Secretary will read the memorial. The Chair hears no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

"Whereas there seems to be danger of Federal interference with the movement of the South's cotton crop; and

"Whereas there seems to be grave danger of an embargo being placed on cotton; and

"Whereas such interference and such embargo would largely affect and lower the price of said crop: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the House of Representatives of Georgia do most earnestly and insistently protest the placing of cotton under Government control in any manner whatsoever.

"Resolved, second, That a copy of this resolution be furnished Georgia Senators and Representatives in Congress, hereby urging them to fight to the last any such effort.

"In House. Read and adopted August 15, 1917.

"E. B. MOORE, Clerk of House."

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I desire to say just a word in reference to this resolution. My own sentiments are very much in accord with those so well expressed on this floor yesterday afternoon by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. I do not believe that the Legislature of Georgia nor the cotton planters of Georgia would object to any necessary movement in order to prevent the use of any part of their cotton for explosives by Germans or any other forces engaged in war against our country. No matter what the financial loss to the cotton producer might be from such a transaction, their patriotism is such that they would readily submit to it without any murmur. But any attempt based on any other reason and for any other purpose except that is utterly unjust and entirely unnecessary, and I hope may not be undertaken.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, there is no argument that can be added to what the able Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] stated on yesterday and the learned Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] stated this morning on the question of putting an embargo on cotton. My constituents are largely interested in the cotton industry, and of course are vitally concerned about any measure that might be enacted by Congress the effect of which would be to lower the price of cotton. The Senator from Georgia a few minutes ago voiced my sentiments thoroughly on this subject. The people of Mississippi are devoted, patriotic Americans, and if necessary to make the sacrifice they would not hesitate to sacrifice every bale of cotton and every bushel of corn, together with the precious lives of their fathers, sons, and husbands in the successful prosecution of this war for the honor of their country. If they thought this commodity was transported to the enemy and used against us in this war, the sacrifice, I repeat, would be made with alacrity. But permit me to indulge the hope that before any action may be taken by the President or Congress which would result in lowering the price of cotton the matter shall be thoroughly investigated, so that we can act upon the truth rather than an apprehension which the war-distracted mind may conjure or imagine in this time of stress. Speaking for the people of Mississippi, I want to say that we will not knowingly permit cotton to go to neutral countries which may ultimately find its destination in the enemy's country, regardless of how attractive the prices may be. It might not be out of place for me to observe that the people of Mississippi did not desire this war, but now that war is on they will do their bit patriotically in the prosecution of it to a triumphant end. Whatever mistakes may have been committed in the beginning, since their country is involved in war they will not falter in their devotion.

The farmers of Mississippi have suffered sorely for the last three years from the blighting effects of war. In 1914, on account of the war in Europe and the failure of the National Government to help the cotton growers in the time of stress, cotton dropped from 13 cents to less than 6 cents per pound—less than the cost of production. The embargo put on cotton by England to the neutral countries, in violation of international law, in 1915 caused a loss of $20 per bale to the struggling, impecunious cotton growers of the South. On the crops of these two years alone the people of the South lost three-quarters of a billion dollars. Last year the crop was short, and with the high price they have had to pay for everything they bought the result to them has been very disastrous. It would be inexcusable, bordering onto crime, if Congress or the President should take any action looking to a reduction in the price of cotton, unless it should be necessary to do it in order to keep cotton from reaching the enemy's country.

Mr. President, I am going to venture the suggestion that in the investigation of this question it would be prudent for Senators to look thoroughly into the matter. We all understand that at this season of the year the manufacturers are interested in lowering the price of cotton so they may get cheaper raw material for their mills. And that is true of the American spinner as well as the European manufacturer. In this age when the dollar is the god and commerce the religion with so many people, it is not regarded as a crime for a man to use such methods as the "cry of cotton going to the enemy's country" in order that the price may be lowered. I am afraid that the real source of alarm or apprehension is not that the "cotton is going to the enemy's country," but that the manufacturers of cotton may be forced to pay the farmers a fair price for their product. It may be that this is another piece of sinister selfishness committed in the name of patriotism—patriotism which is too often "the refuge of the scoundrel."

I do not know that anything of this kind is being done, but I want to warn Senators who desire to see justice done against the wiles of the cunning financier.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hollis	Nelson	Smith, Mich.
Beckham	Husting	New	Smith, S. C.
Brady	James	Norris	Smoot
Brandegee	Johnson, Cal.	Overman	Sterling
Calder	Jones, Wash.	Page	Stone

Mr. MYERS. My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. My colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] is unavoidably detained from the Senate this morning on official business.

Mr. HUSTING. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the senior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], and the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] are detained on official business.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is detained on important public business. I ask that this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], on account of illness. I ask that this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-one Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. LODGE obtained the floor.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. GORE. Will the Senator yield to me for a couple of minutes?

Mr. LODGE. Yes. I desire to go on with a short speech, but I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I merely want to second what has just been said by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] and what was said yesterday by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH].

My State is one of the leading cotton States in the Union. It produces something like a million bales a year. The people of my State desire a short and successful war and an early, honorable, and lasting peace. They would not, either directly or indirectly, contribute to the strength, efficiency, or resources of the enemy.

The cotton planters of my State are willing to make any financial sacrifice, any contribution necessary to the national defense and for the success of our national arms. But they think that their sacrifice and contribution ought to be just, ought to be reasonable, and ought to be apportioned to the sacrifices and contributions of other citizens and other classes of our citizenship. They would, of course, protest, as they would have a right to protest, against any unfair and disproportionate exaction. An embargo on cotton is unnecessary. It would prove injurious, if not disastrous, to the entire cotton section. We should not needlessly implant in the minds of the cotton producers a sense of injustice. It is to be feared that the wheat producers already have too much reason to believe that an injury, not to say an injustice, is being inflicted upon them. Psychology is one of the most important resources of war, and it ought to be conserved.

I thank the Senator from Massachusetts for his courtesy.

WAR REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses and for other purposes.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, for the past two months my time and thought, with slight exceptions, have been wholly occupied with the consideration of the bill now before the Senate, and I desire to speak upon it at no great length to the Senate. I have not yet done so. I have only spoken briefly on one or two amendments and I desire now to say something about the general principles upon which the bill was framed.

The Committee on Finance, Mr. President, devoted a great deal of time and thought and patient work to the framing of this bill. I have had a somewhat long experience in this body. I have had a share in the making of some tariff bills, and in framing immigration bills, and I had a chief part in framing the Philippine organic act, so that I can speak with some knowledge of work upon important bills. I have never seen any committee which has worked so hard and so faithfully and so disinterestedly as the Committee on Finance upon this measure. We had the assistance of officers of the Treasury Department, Mr. McCoy, Mr. Boyd, Mr. Beaman, Mr. Talbot, and Mr. West, five of the best experts possible, familiar with all the details of legislation, and I think we were well informed. We saw and talked with the people affected all over the country and also had hearings on the interests involved.

What is true of the committee, Mr. President, is particularly true of the chairman, who not only gave all his days to the bill, but who worked also at night upon it, and brought to his task a constructive ability, a perfect disinterestedness, and a determination to make the bill on the best economic principles for the best interests of the country and the war without regard to sectional or party desires.

Mr. President, this bill turns on two principles, as the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] said yesterday when he began his speech. Those two vital questions, beside which everything else is unimportant, comparatively speaking, are the proportion of expenditures to be raised by taxation and that paid for by loans and the imposition of taxation in such a manner as to maintain business in the highest state of productivity and activity. I shall speak first of the proportion of expenditures to be raised by taxation and by loans, respectively.

It is, I think, obvious that between John Trumbull's often-quoted line, "What is posterity to us," and the proposition to raise all the expenditures by taxation a just mean must be found. It would be bad financiering in the highest degree, in my opinion, to raise our entire expenditures by loans. It would be equally bad financiering—in fact, I think it would be destructive and impossible almost—to attempt to raise $11,000,000,000, which are our expenditures actually appropriated for and estimated, by taxation in a single year. It would paralyze the country and break down the entire financial system. It would be absolutely ruinous, in my judgment, to the part the United States must take in this war if it is to be won. That fact alone is sufficient to condemn it.

Reasonably heavy taxation in war times is the great bulwark of the credit of the country. That it should be so is sound in every respect. But there must also be loans, and it may be said in passing that future generations have as great a stake in this war as the present generation, and to put the entire sacrifice, both of life and treasure, upon the present generation would not only be grossly unjust but helpful to our enemies. My own opinion is that we have adjusted the relation between the amount to be raised by taxation and the amount to be raised by loans as accurately and as fairly as it can be done.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] cited the cases of the Napoleonic wars and of the Crimea. I think during the Napoleonic wars economic conditions were so very different in every respect that it is hardly a parallel case. The Crimean War was so far removed from this war in magnitude that it is difficult to make a comparison with it. The same may apply to our own Civil War; but it is well to remember that in 1864 and 1865 for the first time we adjusted our taxation, as I believe it should have been adjusted from the beginning, by raising 30 per cent, or perhaps a little over, of the annual expenditures by taxation, and that has remained, I think, a rather high record.

Mr. President, the economists and statesmen of Great Britain are certainly well informed on such a subject as this, and I think that it is worth while to look at what they have done since the war began. From August 1, 1914, to March 31, 1915, they raised by revenue £171,000,000 sterling, and they borrowed £404,000,000 sterling. The percentage of expenditure raised by taxation was 34½ per cent.

For the year ending March 31, 1916, they raised £336,000,000 sterling—I give only the millions—of revenue, and their new borrowings were £1,164,000,000 sterling, the percentage of expenditures raised by taxation being 31.6 per cent.

For the year ending March 31, 1917, the revenue was £573,000,000 sterling; the new borrowing was £1,625,000,000 sterling, and the percentage of expenditures raised by taxation, 28.35.

From April 6 to July 31, 1917, the revenue was £128,000,000 sterling; the new borrowing was £595,000,000 sterling, and the percentage of expenditures raised by taxation was 17.6 per cent.

The total amount raised by revenue from August 1, 1914, to July 7, 1917, was £1,210,000,000 sterling; the new borrowing was £3,792,000,000 sterling. The percentage of expenditures raised by taxation during the whole period of the war has been 24.3.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. REED. Can the Senator tell us what proportion of the moneys charged as expenditures were in fact moneys advanced to England's allies, and for which she received some kind of return?

Mr. LODGE. The amount advanced to her dominions was £142,000,000 sterling, and to the allies £828,000,000 sterling.

Mr. REED. Are those sums included in the amounts from which the Senator draws his percentages?

Mr. LODGE. These figures are taken from the London Economist, and I assume those amounts are included in the totals of the borrowings. But even if we assume that the entire amount lent to the Dominion and other allies was secured, England's proportion of taxation to expenditures was only a trifle over 43 per cent.

Mr. President, this bill was based upon the estimates furnished on the 2d of July of the expenditures for the ensuing year. The estimate was $5,653,000,000. Of that we propose to raise by taxation $1,300,000,000 under existing law, and $2,000,000,000 by the new taxation in this bill, making in all $3,300,000,000 of the $5,653,000,000 of the estimated expenditures with which we had to deal. The Senate will see that 58 per cent is the proportion of taxation to loans.

After the bill was completed, on the 24th of July, to be exact, 22 days later, we were informed by the Secretary of the Treasury that there were estimates for new expenditures amounting to $5,000,000,000 and over. It was decided by the committee, after careful consideration, not to carry the taxation at this moment beyond the point of supplying the money actually appropriated. The money for the new estimates has not yet been appropriated; it is not yet a charge on the Treasury. It was impossible to tell beforehand what the actual appropriations would be as compared with the estimates, the estimates, I think, including the enormous increases for the Army, which I believe made up about $5,000,000,000 of the amount. Adding the estimates of from $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 for the Navy, I think it would probably have reached five and a half billion dollars. Those estimates, as I have said, are not yet appropriated for. I understand that the House appropriation bill which is now approaching completion will carry, in round numbers, about four and a half billion dollars.

No reductions have been made, I think, for any expenditures which are required at the moment, which are needed now or which will be needed within the fiscal year; but some reductions were made where authorizations were necessary, but where the money would not be called for until after the close of the fiscal year. Adding that amount of four and a half billion dollars to the expenditures estimated for on July 2, we get, in round numbers, $10,000,000,000; and this bill, together with existing taxation, carries over 30 per cent of expenditures for the year, both those appropriated for and those estimated, as large a percentage as the highest of the Civil War and nearly as large as the English percentage.

Mr. President, it seems to me that that is a fair balance between loans and taxation. We shall have to increase taxes; we shall be obliged to increase them very soon, either now or in December when Congress meets again. It seemed desirable, therefore, to construct a bill upon which increases could be placed easily and without disturbance of existing conditions, and, as I have said, I believe this has been done.

I now come, Mr. President, to our second proposition—the maintenance of business in the highest state of productivity. The great bulk of the taxes proposed to be raised by this bill are taken from two sources, incomes and war profits, and both those taxes, though different in form, come from the same fund. Under the present law we raise from individual incomes, normal and surtaxes, and from the corporation tax $360,000,000; in the House bill additional $615,000,000, and, according to the Senate bill, additional $777,000,000. Under the present law we raise from the war-profits tax $226,000,000; the House added $200,000,000; and the Senate bill adds $562,000,000.

Taking the whole of the taxation, the whole of the $3,300,000,000, we raise $1,925,000,000 from those sources, and in the additional taxation we raise $1,613,000,000 out of $2,000,000,000. If we now add liquor and tobacco taxes we find that from the total, $3,300,000,000 imposed by taxes, $2,582,000,000 are taken from war profits, incomes, liquor and tobacco, leaving in round numbers about $700,000,000 to be raised from other sources.

The existing tariff, I think, supplies about $240,000,000 of that $700,000,000. The remainder is derived from general taxes, some known as consumption taxes and others as nonconsumption taxes. Those taxes fall on the entire population of the United States, not on the poor man alone—far from it. They fall on everybody, and in some instances, as in the case of sugar, for example, the rich or the well-to-do pay a much heavier proportion of the sugar tax than persons of more limited means. The amount of sugar consumed conforms very largely to the general scale of expenditures of the household, and a large proportion of the sugar consumed is in the form of candies, which I think may be denominated luxuries.

The consumption taxes which have been attacked in this bill are on tea, coffee, cocoa, and sugar. They are very moderate taxes. Tea, coffee, and sugar are taxed and have practically always been taxed by every civilized nation in the world. We are an exception in not imposing taxes on tea and coffee; in that respect we stand almost alone. The way that came about was this: We had the taxes on tea and coffee at the time of the Civil War. As time went on we began to produce a surplus of revenue under our tariff system, which was a protective system in those days. It seemed desirable to reduce the surplus revenue collected, and the protectionists then in control of the Government took off the duties on tea and coffee, those articles not being produced in this country and that action being in accord with the protective principle, and put forth the ingenious claim to popular favor that they were giving the country a "free breakfast table." Although it was a protective cry, it was communicated to the Democratic Party, and they have become as sensitive about the "free breakfast table" as we ever were.

These commodities are absolutely legitimate sources of revenue. We propose to raise but a small amount of revenue from them. I have had letters by the thousands, nearly, and so has every other member of the committee, in connection with nearly everything in this bill; but I have not had one letter of objection from any consumer in regard to the taxes on tea and coffee. The objection to them comes solely from politicians—I ought to say public men and statesmen—it has not come from the consumers of the country. There have been some objections, I think, about the floor tax from dealers in those articles; but, as to sugar, I have not had a single objection from anybody except the producers of the commodity. There has been no popular opposition to these taxes visible. The fact is the amount of tax when distributed to the individual is so trifling that the average man does not feel concerned with it at all.

Mr. President, I do not admit the soundness of the doctrine that any class of people in this country should be exempted as such from their share in paying taxes. Those who have large incomes, and whose business makes large earnings, of course must pay and should pay the great bulk of the taxes; but I believe under a democracy that just as every man is bound to offer his services for the defense of the country in time of war, every man is bound to make his contribution to the expenses of the Government, if it is not more than 10 cents a year. I do not think you can carry on a democracy in a wholesome way on any other basis.

But, Mr. President, I have been led off to speak about the consumption taxes. My proposition is, and the figures bear it out, that the amount raised from those sources is trifling. If you will analyze the taxes which make up that $380,000,000 in this bill, the number of real consumption taxes is very small.

There are taxes on amusements, from which a considerable revenue is expected. I can not see why people who have money to spend purely on amusements should not spend a portion of that money for the benefit of the country. If they have the money to spare for amusements, they can spare an additional cent or two in taxes.

I do not regard a tax on automobiles as a tax on one of the necessaries of life. The great mass of the automobiles are used for pleasure. The man who can afford to use an automobile, no matter how cheap the car may be, puts himself in a position where his expenses must be elastic in the maintenance of the car.

There are the stamp taxes, to which no objection is made, and to which no objection should be made, and which fall very generally upon all the people of the country.

There are small taxes on freights, telegraph messages, and tickets of passage on railroads or steamboats, very small in each case, but yielding a large sum in the aggregate. I do not think any of those are consumption taxes, strictly speaking, and I think they are all justifiable.

There is a tax raising a comparatively small amount of money placed on such things as rackets, lacrosse bats, and all that sort of thing, which are merely for games and sports.

There is also a tax on perfumes and cosmetics, and a further tax, only 2 per cent, on the gross sales—although the committee did not approve the principle of gross-sales taxes—on what are known generally as patent or proprietary medicines, but which include all sorts of things of that kind which operate under a patent or trade-mark. The amount to be raised is not very large. I think it is an extremely just tax. These people, nearly all of them, have a monopoly to begin with—a monopoly granted by the Government. It is an industry in which huge fortunes have been made, in which the articles are sold at an enormous profit, the materials being very cheap, and the profit which is possible under a trade-mark or patent correspondingly large. They have been called the poor man's medicines. As medicines they are not cheap; they are expensive. They have an alcoholic value which of course adds to the charm of many of them, from "Hot Drops," for instance, with an alcoholic content of 60 per cent, and "Peruna," with an alcoholic content of 40 per cent, the sale of which, I was told by the Senator from Colorado, has increased one hundredfold in his State since it has gone "dry." They do furnish in those cases, I suppose, a very cheap form of stimulant, but I have never understood the tenderness for that particular industry. As I have said, enormous fortunes have been made out of it. They make great profits, and the product is of no special benefit to anybody except those who are fortunate enough to own the successful patent.

Then there are the taxes through the post office. Those are not consumption taxes, but they are general taxes. In the first place, there is the increase on first-class mail. It falls with the greatest weight on the people who write the most letters. The people who write the most letters are naturally the great corporations, the great business houses, people engaged in business in a large way. With the average man the tax paid a cent at a time is not noticed and it can be collected without one additional dollar of expense to the Government. It costs no more to sell a 3-cent stamp than it does to sell a 2-cent stamp. The machinery is all there. It is pure gain to the Government.

That leaves the consumption taxes on practically the four articles of which I have spoken. The amount of tax in each case is very small, although the amount to be raised by them all is considerable—$87,000,000. I think, Mr. President, that a taxation measure which draws $2,582,000,000—for I must include all the year—out of war profits, income taxes, liquor, and tobacco is not an ill-balanced bill. It seems to me very moderate in the amount raised from other sources than those I have mentioned.

Mr. President, I wish to speak briefly now in regard to the war-profits tax.

In the first place, as to the much-contested basis of exemption: At one of the earliest meetings of the committee the proposition to abandon what seems to me the extremely crude method of the House bill and of the now existing law was brought forward by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], whose absence I greatly regret, and the cause of his absence still more. He brought it forward and presented it with great force, and after much discussion I think the committee, with hardly an exception—I do not know of one—agreed as to the superiority of that basis of exemption in raising the war-profits tax.

"Excess profits" really means nothing. It is almost impossible of determination. If you lay down an arbitrary line of 8 per cent, you name a profit which is probably far too low for the ordinary risks of ordinary business, which is certainly far too low if men are to be encouraged to enter any business, especially, for instance, the mining business, where the hazards are great. "Excess profits" may be anything. What seems excess to one person and in one business may be only reasonable to another. But if you segregate the war profits—whether or not they are directly owing to the war, in any event all of them have been additions to the normal profits of peace times made during the war period—you get a body of profits, and a very large body of profits, which you can at once segregate and define.

The committee determined to adopt as the basis of exemption the normal profits in each case made by individuals, partnerships, and corporations in the prewar period. All the belligerent and neutral countries, with the exception of Spain and Canada, have adopted this system. They have all retained it, and none has abandoned it. I think when we take that aggregate of opinion it is not to be lightly dismissed. Those countries have been anxious to raise as much money as possible and to get it out of the profits of the war as largely as possible, and they have adopted this method as the one which causes fewer injustices and fewer inequalities than any other. There is no method on earth which can be devised for imposing this war-profits tax—which we recognize must be our chief source of revenue—in which there will not be inequalities and injustices.

I can go to work now, standing on my feet, and give real and imaginary cases which seem, and perhaps are, evidence of injustice or inequality which might arise under this bill. What we aimed to do was to get a system which, on the whole, produced fewer inequalities and injustices than any other and raised more revenue from that source than any other. This is particularly true when a heavy tax is to be levied and on a large scale.

After long discussion we adopted for a normal the English basis of the three years immediately preceding the war. We compared it carefully with the German provision for five years, throwing out the highest and lowest and averaging the remaining three, and we found that on the whole the basis of the three years prior to the war was the most lenient to the taxpayer, and on the whole the justest.

We were then met by the difficulty of the corporations which had either made no money, or which were new corporations that had no prewar profits, and for those we established an exemption to be determined by the average profits of corporations engaged in like business during the prewar period. I can see nothing fairer than that.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like to ask the Senator what his view is concerning what should be done with respect to this sort of situation: I think I could name some businesses the representative concern in which, during the prewar period, would be doing what we might call a subnormal business.

Mr. LODGE. I was just coming to that, if the Senator will allow me.

Then came up the next difficulty, and the most serious difficulty, of the subnormal profits, to which the Senator from Delaware has referred. We worked over that a long time. We ended by giving them the same exemption that we gave to those who had made no profits—that is, an exemption of the average profit of like businesses.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. But it was felt by the committee, and I believe the chairman proposes to offer an amendment to that effect, that there should be added to this a proviso that the exemption of the average of like business should not fall below 6 per cent.

Mr. WOLCOTT. That answers my question.

Mr. LODGE. I think myself it would be well to make our limit 8 per cent. The committee voted 6 per cent. That seemed to us to cover new corporations, corporations that made no profits, and corporations that made subnormal profits. I ought to say also that we have carefully provided for cases where there has been an increase or a decrease of stock in a corporation.

The arbitrary exemption, drawing the line of the House and imposing a flat rate, would lead to very gross inequalities indeed. For instance, if we took the House exemption of 8 per cent and applied it we should practically exempt every railroad in the country.

Under the House provision, as has been shown by the table furnished by the chairman of the committee, which I will not repeat, it will be seen that, proceeding on the profits of the year 1916, the House took $21,000,000 from the United States Steel Corporation, and our bill took $76,000,000 under our system. I believe estimates have been made of their profits for this year. If their profits for this year are what the first six months indicate, we shall take, I think, in the neighborhood of $200,000,000 from that corporation alone. I have heard estimates given that the four great steel companies of the country alone will pay a very large proportion of the entire tax.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator is speaking of the Steel Corporation?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I am speaking of that.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think it will pay an excess-profits tax of $148,000,000, based upon their earnings for the first two quarters of this year. That is their estimate.

Mr. LODGE. Then there is their 6 per cent normal.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; they pay that.

Mr. LODGE. That does not include the 6 per cent normal.

Mr. SIMMONS. No.

Mr. LODGE. But the war profits alone.

Mr. SIMMONS. The war profits alone.

Mr. LODGE. If you add the 6 per cent normal, it will come very near to $200,000,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very near to $200,000,000.

If the Senator will pardon me in this connection, in a colloquy had with the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] a few days ago I stated inadvertently that this company, as I was advised it was estimated, would pay 44 per cent upon their earnings by way of excess profits. I was mistaken about that. An expert of the Treasury has made a thorough calculation, and he advises me that instead of 44 per cent it will be on an average of 48 per cent.

Mr. BORAH. That is, 48 per cent of their profits?

Mr. SIMMONS. Of their war profits, their net earnings during the war period.

Mr. BORAH. Their peace profits in 1913 were $71,000,000. Then, there is $71,000,000 you add to that, and it is 54 per cent war profits, and you take 54 per cent of it.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator has in mind the estimate for the three quarters.

Mr. LODGE. May I say a word? Their capital in round figures is about $1,000,000,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. One billion seven hundred million dollars.

Mr. LODGE. Their net earnings for the three prewar years averaged about $70,000,000. The Senator can calculate what the interest is and how much of it you get on the 8 per cent flat rate.

Mr. BORAH. I am not arguing for an 8 per cent flat rate.

Mr. LODGE. No; I did not think the Senator was.

Mr. SIMMONS. The average is around $70,000,000. In 1916 their earnings were $71,000,000, and it would leave their war profits $200,000,000.

Mr. BORAH. What would be the profit of the United States Steel Co. for the year 1916 after you had deducted the amount which you propose to deduct by your bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. Two hundred and seventy million dollars.

Mr. BORAH. That would be their profit?

Mr. SIMMONS. For 1916. Now, if the Senator will pardon me, they made about as much during the first two quarters of this year as they made during the whole of the year 1916. Their profit based upon the first three quarters, as I recall it, was $568,000,000, as against $271,000,000 last year. After deducting their prewar profit from that amount there will be left, according to the Wall Street Journal, for this year $490,000,000, representing their war profits.

Mr. LODGE. I have the same respect for the arithmetical power of the Senator from Idaho as I have for his legal power, but when he said 64——

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I was wrong as to that, but I finally arrived, by the assistance of the Senator from North Carolina, at what their profits would be for the year 1916.

Mr. LODGE. There is no doubt of it.

Mr. BORAH. That is what I was seeking to get at. The details of my figures were incorrect, but the sum total——

Mr. LODGE. They are less than 52 per cent.

Mr. BORAH. I accept that.

Mr. SMOOT. The average prewar period Steel Corporation profits were $63,587,777.

Mr. LODGE. They would very largely escape under the House provision.

Mr. SMOOT. Under the 8 per cent House provision they would.

Mr. LODGE. They get off with $21,000,000.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. An average for what years?

Mr. SMOOT. For the years 1911, 1912, and 1913. In fact, I can give the exact earnings of the company for each year. In 1916——

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the Senator from Massachusetts had better indicate to whom he yields. There are four or five Senators on the floor.

Mr. LODGE. I will yield to the Senator from Idaho and then to my colleague and then I shall be glad to go on. I have nearly finished.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to ask, while we have a mathematician on the floor, how much would be the earnings of the United States Steel this year after you have deducted the amount which you deduct under the bill? What would be its earnings to be distributed among its own stockholders after it paid its tax under the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. I can not give the exact figures because it would take me a little time to figure it, but, in round numbers, it would be $252,000,000 after the excess profits or war tax was deducted.

Mr. LODGE. You would have to deduct the normal.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course; I was going to do that. If the profits continue the third and fourth quarters of this year on the same ratio that they were for the first and second quarters, the profits of the United States Steel Co. would be $490,000,000, and under the excess-profits tax we deduct 48 per cent and a fraction as war profits. Besides that, before the war-profits tax takes effect, we also deduct the normal tax of 6 per cent, which would be $2,000,000 more. So, in round numbers, it will be as I stated.

Mr. LODGE. That is 6 per cent on the whole net income?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; that is on the whole net income. So, in round numbers, I should say it would be about $250,000,000.

Mr. BORAH. The profits then retained by the steel company after all these deductions would be about $250,000,000?

Mr. SMOOT. About $250,000,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reporter is quite unable to hear what is going on. To whom does the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. LODGE. I was going to say something myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I think the Senator from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. LODGE. I was going to say, it is to be remembered also that a large portion of those earnings which escape the war profits will be divided among the stockholders and will all pay an income tax and surtax. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. WEEKS. I wish to suggest that the discussion of the profits which have been earned by the United States Steel Co. is a pertinent one, but when you leave that to enter into the realm of speculation, if the purpose of the administration is carried out to regulate profits not only for our Government but for the allies and for individuals to cost and a small profit, there will not be any excess profits for the United States Steel Co. or the Government hereafter, and we shall have to look to some other source for this $200,000,000 of revenue which we are now getting.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the point I made was the superiority of the basis adopted by the committee to the arbitrary and flat-rate basis proposed by the House. Its immense superiority as a revenue raiser is beyond question. Look at the table presented by the Senator from North Carolina and look at the table in the minority report—I think on page 95—a very elaborate and valuable table of corporations, and you will find the same result. Now, as to its justice. I do not mean to say it in any but the pleasantest way, but if Senators had given to this question, as the committee has, over two months of really hard work, they would have found that the difficulties and injustices and inequalities were far greater in any flat rate and arbitrary exemption than in the one proposed by the committee. It is very easy to imagine hard cases. As I have said already, I could bring forward some myself. Hard cases make bad laws. The only way in which the committee could proceed was to get a system which, on the whole, would produce the fairest general results, a system which, as I have said already, has behind it the opinion of every economist of every country now engaged in war and of every neutral country, except Spain.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator has just stated that the basis of the committee report on excess profits has behind it the system of every country in the world except Spain.

Mr. LODGE. And Canada.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have carefully read the statutes of every one of those countries since the bill has come before the Senate. I do not find a single country except Spain that has a basis for levying a war-profits tax that is in accord with the report of the committee at all.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, I will give him the results of the researches of the committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am talking about the basis of the taxes, not the fact that they tax war profits. I mean the basis on which they attempt to tax war profits.

Mr. LODGE. The chairman of the committee placed in his speech, and it represented the figures which were derived from the investigations of the Treasury experts and our own, a statement which I think was fairly careful:

Great Britain allows the average profits of two prewar years out of three; France three prewar years, exactly as ours; Italy two prewar years, 1913 and 1914—

Italy did not enter the war until after 1914—

Russia two prewar years; Germany three of five prewar years, excluding the best and the worst; Austria three of five prewar years, excluding the best and the worst; Denmark two of the three, 1912, 1913, and 1914; Norway, two years; Sweden, two years; and Holland three years, just as ours. The only two countries out of the 14 countries, one at war and the other a neutral—one in Europe and the other on this continent—imposing a war-profits tax upon any other than the base provided in this bill, are Spain and Canada.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will allow me, of course I have read what he has stated, and as far as it goes that is undoubtedly correct, but England took the three prewar years and then allowed——

Mr. LODGE. England allows a choice of two years.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Surely. That is what I was going to say.

Mr. LODGE. The committee, if I may be pardoned, did not overlook it, and some of us voted for it in committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The basis of the tax is entirely different from what the English tax is. This is not a tax; it is an exemption.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, it is not different except in the fact that England allows a choice.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But the Senator does not go to the text of his own bill.

Mr. LODGE. Perhaps I do not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. At least as I understood the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. I am ready to be instructed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If I am not correct I would be glad to have the Senator correct me now, because I do not care to be misled by my own reading of the Senator's bill. If the only proposition involved in this controversy was a question of taking a prewar basis for the assessment of the taxes, or rather the allowance of this exemption, because it is an allowance of exemption, England and France and European countries have tried to obtain what your committee is trying to obtain in this bill. If the basis of your exemption was fixed on a prewar period for a certain number of years, I grant you you would be in accord with what most of the European countries have done. But you do not stop there, and you do not go as far as they do. The attempt in the Eurpean countries was to avoid the taxation of normal profits and to fix a basis that would be assured. Each one of those countries after they fix the prewar period for the allowance of an exemption say that there shall be exempt in any event, some of the countries say 8 per cent, some 5 per cent, some 6 per cent. If my recollection serves me aright, I think in Great Britain it is 6 per cent. At any rate it varies.

Mr. LODGE. It was 6 per cent, and it has been raised to 9 per cent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They stabilize it, and put everybody on the same basis of exemption. Now, the committee in reporting this bill strikes out that stabilizing feature which aids the man who did not make any profit in prewar days and aids to help put him on an equal basis with the man who has made a prewar-period profit. But the real error in the committee's report, the point of danger that I see in the committee's report that will lead to many inequalities, is the fact that it may take the surplus of these corporations and inject it into the proposition in trying to determine the basis of exemption.

Now, I am not in favor of eliminating surplus. I know the necessity of the corporation carrying a surplus, but when you drag into the basis of an exemption not a taxation the question as to whether a corporation has accumulated a large surplus, the corporation that has profits in the prewar period, especially the immediate prewar period since starting the war in Europe, the munitions corporations, that are more likely to have a surplus than the ordinary corporation that was doing ordinary business, would be exempt, and the real basis of your exemption in this and in many cases is going to turn on that surplus that you put in this bill as a basis of calculating your exemption.

It is for that reason a corporation like the United States Steel Corporation and many of that kind of large corporations in this country are almost entirely exempt from not all taxation but from the taxation under this excess-profits provision.

Now, I am in accord with the view of the committee in attempting to eliminate from this excess-profits tax the ordinary business profit and levy a tax on corporations that are making their profits out of the war, but I say that your committee in writing your report, especially by bringing in this surplus tax, abandoned the English basis, you have abandoned the French basis, you have abandoned the basis of every nation in Europe that levies its taxes, and you reach a basis where you are going to aid some man who has been exceedingly prosperous from war conditions and penalize the man who has suffered from war conditions.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I still think that I understand the bill. We have reached precisely the same result in a different way as that desired by the Senator from Alabama. The great body of the corporations, of course, were making normal profits before the war. By deducting in each case their entire normal profits there is no difficulty to be encountered at all. The difficulties only come when you reach the subnormal; and that we have covered precisely as England has covered it. We have also covered the no profits, as I have pointed out, and the new business.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator pardon an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KNOX in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], as I understood, took the position that the English Government has safeguarded the case of a man who is making a subnormal profit against excessive taxation by allowing him an exemption, which should not be less than 6 per cent in any case. The Senator from Massachusetts said we were taking care of that as England has taken care of it. We have taken care of it, but in a different way. We have taken care of it by permitting the corporations with a subnormal profit during the prewar period to have the tax levied on the average profits made during six years by representative concerns in like business.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, what I have been saying thus far has been in an attempt to give my reasons for believing that the committee has adopted the proper basis of exemption in calculating war profits. I want to say one other thing as to a difficulty which we have tried to minimize—the difficulty of the flat-rate exemption of 8 per cent, as proposed by the House of Representatives. On what is that 8 per cent to be calculated? You at once open a perfect tangle of questions in every case that comes up. On what is the 8 per cent earned? What is the capital? Of what does it consist? How much must you allow for patents? How much must you allow for good will? How much must you deduct for water? Endless questions arise. The more the committee considered the matter the more it seemed to them to be "no thoroughfare"; and we came to the conclusion that the only method to follow is to take the profits of the company as they are shown at the time and as they are calculated at the time, as they are required, in the case of the railroads at least, to be calculated, to show net profits according to the books, and tax them on the profits as they appear.

Mr. President, I have taken much longer than I meant to, but I wish now to come to the question of amount. I have not the slightest desire to protect wealth from taxation; I wish to take from it by taxation all that we possibly can with safety to the other demands which must fall upon what is called wealth; but I have no insane hatred of wealth; I do not think honest business success a crime; I wish to treat it in such a way as will be most helpful to the success of the country in war. The income tax and the war-profits tax both come out of the same fund. They come out of the earnings of the country, directly or indirectly. I believe we have gone to the limit of safety in the taxes imposed for the first year. As the war goes on we must raise those taxes very high, as England has done. I am speaking of this year; we may have to do it in less than three months from now; but at present I think we have gone to the limit of safety in what we have imposed.

What does that fund have to provide? As my colleague [Mr. WEEKS] pointed out yesterday, it provides for practically all the resources of every educational, philanthropic, and charitable institution in the country, and if wealth is overtaxed all these great charities, all our institutions of learning would be crippled. But what must it provide from the public point of view alone? In the first place, it must provide the surplus necessary to carry on business. The times are abnormal. Corporations, in order to develop and carry on their business and keep it to the point where it should be can not go into the loan market, which the United States is preempting, and get money as they could before. That is impossible. Even the strongest of them find great difficulty at this moment in borrowing money at high rates of interest. We must allow a reasonable surplus in order to keep business in the highest state of productivity and prosperity, for if business fails and the war profits go down the profits taxes go down with them and the income taxes go down, and then we shall have but one resource, and that is consumption taxes of the heaviest and most burdensome kind, which I desire by all means that we shall avoid.

We are likely to have our war profits and our income taxes go down in any event, because the Government apparently is going arbitrarily to fix prices on everything which in any manner can be held to relate to the war. Apparently "bare living profits" is their idea. If you cut down the industries of the country to "bare living profits," the question of a war-profits tax will need no argument. We can not get a war-profits tax unless there are war profits from which to take it. I am ready to raise them to the highest practicable point, but I do not want to be left without money by their failure from arbitrary fixing of prices.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. In connection with the point which the Senator from Massachusetts is now making, I desire to make this suggestion, in order that I may have the Senator's view of it: England is now taking 80 per cent of such profits and this is the third year of England's war.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. England took 50 per cent or 40 per cent—there seems to be a dispute about that; I understood it was 50 per cent, but I have heard the statement that she took 40 per cent the first year and 60 per cent the second year——

Mr. LODGE. I think England took about 40 per cent the first year.

Mr. BORAH. And 80 per cent the third year. We have now had two years of war profits which have gone untouched; there has been no assessment of taxes in the way of war profits. Those profits have been stored away; they belong to the people who have earned them. Would it not be, as a business proposition, quite as safe for us to take 80 per cent, after the people who control the industries have had the advantage of two years, as for England to take 80 per cent after her industries have been taxed from 40 to 60 per cent for two years?

Mr. LODGE. I have not found that England has undertaken to fix low prices for her Government, her domestic consumers, and also for foreigners. She has sold her commodities with the full market profit to her own people for domestic consumption, also to foreign nations. Moreover, I am going to take up the matter of the accumulated surplus in a moment, if the Senator will allow me.

In addition, these funds must pay the bulk of the taxes. I believe the rate will be 60 per cent in a short time, and will reach 80 per cent if the industries are allowed to make money. It may be that we shall take all excess profits, but if there are no such profits to take, the revenue will not amount to much.

However, I come now to the question of accumulated surplus and what to me is the central point in this whole problem. We must have loans. We have issued one loan of $2,000,000,000; we must have $3,000,000,000 more, which has been authorized by a previous bill, to meet our loans to the allies. We have been told on high authority that we should probably have to raise $8,000,000,000 in loans before the first day of the new year.

To the same fund that supplies incomes and war profits we must look to supply our loans. There is nowhere else to look; there is nobody in the world to-day able to lend us a dollar. The allies borrowed from us in the early years of the war—not to a large extent, perhaps, but they borrowed several hundred million dollars. They also had great quantities of American and other securities which they could cash in, the proceeds of which they could put into their own loans. We have no such resources; we have nobody in the world to whom we can sell our securities. If we turn around and throw securities on the market in the effort to sell them to each other, we shall bring on a financial panic which will shake credits throughout the country. We must look to the accumulations, to the surplus, to the excess over the taxes to have our loans taken. There is absolutely no other source for taking up those loans to be found on the planet.

Those loans if they fail will shake the credit of the United States, and the credit of the United States is the great pillar of the war to-day. Imperil the credit of the United States and you imperil the entire war against Germany. It is to our credit above everything else that the world must look to continue this war to complete victory, as I believe it will be continued.

Mr. President, I should not hesitate one moment to take 80 per cent or 90 per cent or all the war profits and put them into taxes if it were not for the other drains upon that same fund. I think it is very important to maintain business activity; I think it is enormously important that all incomes and war profits shall be in a position to yield large returns; but we must remember that to that surplus, whether of income or of earnings, we must look to sustain our credit. That which the individual can save out of his income he will put into the bonds of the United States; if he can not save anything because all his surplus is taken in taxes, the United States is deprived of that resource.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to suggest to the Senator that in the recent bond issue the public did not take the bonds with any alacrity; they were taken very largely by the banks of the country, and in scores of cases, amounting to millions and millions of dollars, the money with which the bonds were bought was furnished by the Government. They were received as security for loans at practically the same rate of interest as the bonds themselves now bear. They have not been absorbed by the general public. It is difficult to have the public absorb them, and the thing that I dread most in this entire situation is that ultimately we may ask the public to take a larger amount of bonds.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, there were difficulties about the liberty loan, but they ended by its being subscribed a billion dollars over what was called for. I have the utmost confidence in the people of the United States that they will take the loans if they have anything with which to take them, and that they will make sacrifices in order to take them.

The total wealth of this country to-day is estimated roughly by economists to be about $300,000,000,000, and the margin of safety in loans on that amount is estimated to be, I believe, about $40,000,000,000. I do not know whether or not we shall be called on for that enormous amount in addition to the taxes, but I do know that the first thing to be considered in all our taxes and in all our arrangement of taxes is the credit of the United States. For that reason taxes ought to be heavy; they ought to raise a very large percentage of the total revenue, as large as we can safely undertake; but behind it all stands the credit of the United States. My one controlling standard is the war. If I thought taking all profits would bring success in war most quickly I would take them. But, as I am of opinion that our credit is the most vital element in winning the war, I wish to reserve a portion of our wealth for that prime object.

Mr. President, it is idle to guess how long this war will continue, but we are suffering sorely now because we failed to prepare for this war. In the two years or more that elapsed between the declaration of war in Europe and our entry into it we made practically no effort to get ready. We plunged into war unprepared, thus involving enormous expenditures and all the cost which haste is sure to bring. Do not let us make another such mistake. We ought to prepare for a long and trying war, and we ought to push our preparations with the speed which we should wish if we believed we could end it in six months. We must not let the continuance of the war find us unprepared; and the greatest preparation is to maintain in full strength and vigor the credit of the United States.

Mr. President, I have believed from the beginning that this war could have but one end. I believe that now all the more strongly since my own country has entered upon it. We have as a Nation an enormous stake in this war. If Germany had been victorious in the first rush we should have been the next victim. We are fighting primarily against becoming a tributary and subject people; we are fortunate, as we have to make this fight, in having others to fight with us; but that is what is at stake for us—our peace, our security, our right to live our own national life in our own way in the future.

The only peace which is worth having is a peace that will last. A peace on the status quo ante bellum would convict every man who voted for the declaration of war and the President who advised it of the blackest of crimes. To enter this war, to shed the blood of our young men, to burden ourselves and posterity with enormous taxes and enormous debts in order to find ourselves at the end with the situation just as it was in the summer of 1914 would be unbearable. We not only should have fought in vain, but we should have fought without reason; we should then be in a position where we should have to spend countless millions in preparing for the next war, which a distinguished German general has just said they must make ready for now.

Mr. President, we are fighting to carry this war through to the end for our own safety in order that we may have our own independence uninterfered with. It is quite true that our victory means the victory of freedom and democracy everywhere, and also the victory of civilization over organized and scientific barbarism; but the democracy which we have first to consider is our own. Our own safety and our own independence are at stake.

Therefore, Mr. President, every sacrifice that is necessary will, I know, be made by the American people; but they will ask in return that for all their sacrifices they have a peace worth having, and we can have no peace without a complete victory. That such a victory will come I am as sure as that I stand upon this floor at this moment, for I do not believe it is written that German victory is possible, because if it were it would make this world a place not worth living in.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, owing to enforced absence I have not been able to hear all of the arguments which have been presented on this bill.

I want first to pay my compliment of respect to the chairman of the Committee on Finance, who has been uniformly courteous and fair, and has given every member of the committee an opportunity to express and impress himself upon the legislation which is proposed. I have never known a man to exhibit more patient industry. I feel myself that the members of that committee have been conscientious in their work, and have done the very best they could to bring forth a bill which would meet the exigencies of the situation. I regret, however, that it seems necessary for me to depart in some particular respects from the conclusions of the majority.

On almost all of the subjects and almost all of the efforts of the committee there has been practical unanimity of purpose and action. I think all of the committee were agreed that an emergency exists, and that large sums of money must be raised, either by taxation or by a bond issue, or both, and that that levy should be made in such a way as to disturb business as little as possible. They felt that the maintenance of commercial and industrial enterprise was absolutely essential to the successful prosecution of the war. We differed, however, as to the amounts to be raised by taxation and as to the particular sources from which it should be raised at this time, and it is upon those questions that I desire to express myself briefly.

I have listened this morning to the argument of the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and I confess that I have been at a loss to harmonize his philosophy with the conclusions he reaches. For instance, he insists during the latter part of his argument that the credit of the United States must be maintained, and that in some way it can be maintained better by a large bond issue than by paying as you go. The money to be raised for this war must be obtained either from taxation or from bond issues, and it is axiomatic that the more you raise from one source the less you have to raise from the other source; it is the same money, whether obtained by taxation or from a bond issue. A bond issue may ultimately increase the money to the bondholder, but it is the same to the Government when it is obtained.

Mr. President, I am no enemy of wealth. I do not think there is any particular virtue either in wealth or in poverty. Neither of them is an attribute of manhood. I believe that honest wealth is absolutely essential to the country. I recognize with great respect the man who has the genius which I do not possess, to see, and has the courage to undertake and the ability to accomplish, the things which are necessary for the prosperity and progress of the world. Indeed, the world would be a waste if it were not for the ability of some men to do things in the world. But I am favorable to wealth at this time because I believe it has an opportunity and the special ability to do a great service to the country. Without government there can be no such thing as property. Property exists simply as a creature of law. A man owns his home or his business because the government protects him in that ownership; and if we are to believe gentlemen on the floor of the Senate and elsewhere that our country is in danger, that our institutions are threatened, then it becomes of the utmost importance that those most directly interested should take a very active part in preserving the government which sustains those institutions.

Mr. President, I feel that now is the time to impose the largest tax consistent with going business upon those who hold and control surplus wealth. There is in the House bill a provision which is retroactive. It taxes last year's profits. Without exception, I believe, the members of the Committee on Finance voted that out because they believed it was unjust. Every man who had anything to be taxed under that provision objected to it.

Now it is proposed that these profits which exist at the present time, which are the greatest in the history of the world, shall not be taxed until possibly next year or the year after. I say to you, Mr. President and Senators, that they can not be reached at that time without much greater difficulty than they can be reached now.

I think an exceedingly large tax levy at this time should be made. The world recognizes us as the richest nation on earth. Germany understands, as does the rest of the belligerents, that the United States is financing this war; yet shall we say now to Germany, our enemy, that we can not raise money except by mortgaging the future; that our reputation for wealth is false and we have not the cash to put up to stop this war? It seems to me, Mr. President, that it is a mistake for us to enlarge the bond issue and diminish the tax levy.

I think we could better afford at this time, after two years of the greatest profits this country has ever known, to make a levy of 75 or 80 per cent upon war profits and still leave to their owners greater profits than the average mind can comprehend untouched by this particular clause of the bill. Therefore I have said that from these sources at this time, and for the purposes of this emergency tax, we should levy a much larger percentage upon profits and incomes than this bill proposes to do. If the war shall fortunately end at the end of a year, then nothing further than present profits will be materially disturbed. If it shall not end, then indeed will we need to have paid the debts of this year and to have made our accounts as nearly current as it is possible for us to do.

I agree with my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan] that you are going to have difficulty in floating your future bond issues. I know it has been reported, as stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, that this liberty bond loan was oversubscribed nearly a billion dollars. I doubt it. I do not believe it was oversubscribed to any such extent. But at what terrific effort was the subscription obtained! Are we sure such effort can be successfully repeated?

Mr. President, I have voted, and am willing still, to vote money sufficient to finance this war so far as it appears to be our duty to do so, although I should feel a good deal better if I knew just what was going to be done with the money. I was discouraged when the Congress of the United States, yielding to Executive coercion, did not exercise the power of supervision, or rather of report upon the expenditure of the large appropriations which we have made. The President is supreme, and my protest is unavailing. I am opposed to including many of these irritating items of taxation in the bill, and that produce small revenues, because of their effect upon the patriotism of the people, which at this time, in my judgment, is not at the highest flood.

It may be unpopular for me to say it, but I speak the truth: This is not a popular war. I believe now it is a necessary one—that now it is, and that we must carry it through to the successful finish. But it is not popular; and we ought to be exceedingly careful, in dealing with this financial question, that we are not discouraging patriotism. Patriotism is not created by Executive declaration or by oratorical effort; it is a quality of soul and not of sentiment.

It is true that many of the taxes in the bill are inconsequential in comparison, because now we are dealing in billions, which the ordinary mind can not understand at all; but we pronounce the word as glibly as we pronounced "thousands" a few years ago. We are dealing in billions, and these little taxes of $400,000,000 do not amount to much; but they furnish good talking points, and they do come home to a great many people. There are some of those to which I do not object, but to some of them I do strenuously object.

I do not believe that we ought to increase the first-class letter postage and not settle the whole postal question squarely on its merits. There are people in this country who believe that certain other classes of postal matter do not pay their proper share of the expenses of the operation of the Post Office Department. We do practically nothing in this bill to equalize those conditions, but every time a man puts an extra stamp upon his letter he is reminded of the fact that he is called upon to pay three times what the service costs, while other classes of mail, even under this measure, will not pay more than a fraction of what their product costs the Government, and also that there are billions of war profits in this country made out of the war and because of the war that go untouched.

I do not believe this law will be more popular with the people when they have to buy tickets on railroad trains or pay freight bills which have been increased lately by the Interstate Commerce Commission. I do not believe it will be popular for the consumers of this country to be obliged to pay an extra price for sugar when the retail price of that article is already almost beyond their reach.

Other items in the bill ought to be eliminated at this time. If we continue in the war for three years, we may have to reach them, but it will be time enough to handle that question when it arrives. It has not yet arrived.

Therefore, Mr. President, I have felt that we ought to raise a much larger sum by taxation than this bill proposes. It will not lessen the ability of the people to buy bonds, because there will not be so many bonds needed. Do you tell me that if we pay a billion dollars in taxes now we are going to cripple the credit of the country when by doing so we simply make it unnecessary to issue an additional billion dollars of bonds later? We have wiped out that account when we pay the bills.

Why, Mr. President, to me it is simply a proposition to pay cash as far as we are able. The time may come when we can not do that; but there is not a provision in this bill, even if you increase your rates, that would interfere with legitimate business. We have avoided carefully, or tried to avoid, infringement upon business capital actually invested, and I felt, and I feel now, that it is a mistake to lessen the tax levy and increase the bond issue.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes.

Mr. OWEN. If we issue bonds instead of paying in cash now, will not those bonds, when they are paid in times of peace, represent a much larger amount of property taken from the people?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator is quite correct.

As I said at the beginning, I tried to follow the philosophy of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], for whose ability I have great respect, but I confess I was unable to do it. It seems to me that every argument he made might have been better made in favor of a larger tax levy and against an increased bond issue.

Mr. President, when the committee was considering this bill it was most courteous to all the business interests of the country. They came before us in large numbers and expressed themselves uniformly as satisfied with the hearing that they had been accorded. I think you will search the hearings in vain to find the case of a single man who did not insist that he was willing that Congress should take all of his profits, if necessary, if you would leave him his capital.

There is not an exception that I can recall. The committee took a small portion of these profits. Then a great many of these gentlemen afterwards wanted still more concessions, not all of them, and I think it is but just to the majority of the business men of this country to say that they are willing that we should take the larger per cent of their profits, if necessary to the successful prosecution of the war.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I wish to ask the Senator if he knows of any instance where the payment of this tax will reduce the normal profits, or rather the profits of corporations below the normal in time of peace?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Not a single instance.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Then, as a matter of fact, these corporations are making no sacrifice whatever to meet this emergency?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator is absolutely right.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Everybody else is doing it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. According to their own admission that is true. But, Mr. President, the war profits are not an unmixed blessing. I am satisfied that the great profits which certain munitions factories and other concerns in this country have made out of our allies have caused more than any other one thing the exorbitant prices which the common people have to pay. Let us take coal and iron, for instance. The operators of coal fields stated to our committee, one person after another, "that while the prices we are getting for coal are exorbitant and more than reasonable yet there are great concerns in this country that have contracts for goods to be sold abroad at prices beyond all reason and all conscience, who come to us and say, 'We will pay you any price for coal,' and they offer us $7, $8, and $9 a ton. Coal is an incident in the war manufacturing business, and yet this war business fixes the price of coal and steel and copper. To the war babies are attributable much of high prices. They pay any price and thus try to corner the market and take the goods.

I confess it is a test of a man's patriotism to sell steel for $56 a ton when somebody stands ready to pay him $140 a ton for it. Who can pay $140 a ton for steel or $9 a ton for coal? A man who is making great war profits. Nobody else can afford to pay it.

So I say, Mr. President, I am not enamored with war profits. If I could have my way about it there would be no war profits in this country that were not devoted to the war expenses of the Government. If they were not sufficient to meet the cost, then I would go to a consumption tax or any other tax that could be equally distributed over the country, and I would expect to have a more prosperous and a more patriotic country.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. May I suggest to the Senator right in this connection, that if we finance the war by bonds instead of increased taxation the bonds must be paid, together with their interest, at a time when there will be no war-profits tax.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Absolutely. I so answered the Senator from Oklahoma. But the Senator must remember that these bonds are bearing interest every minute. Bonds already issued must have their interest paid twice a year. Burdens are going to constantly increase, but inasmuch as we would not disturb the credit or lessen the ability of the country to pay by drawing largely from surplus profits and unusual profits we ought out of the greatest surplus our country has ever known to pay what we reasonably can. It seems to me in fairness not only to our credit, but in fairness to prosperity, we should adopt the honest method of levying and paying a large tax.

Furthermore, Mr. President, a bond issue simply encourages extravagance. It furnishes an opportunity for manipulation by those who deal in bonds. We should avoid it at this time as much as possible.

We have been living for many years, for a generation, in an age of extravagance, almost criminal extravagance. I do not want to do anything to further encourage it, but I would like to discourage it.

Oh, Mr. President, if war profits were relied upon entirely to carry on this war I would rather abolish them with all their attendant train of evils and rely upon other sources of revenue, because we would have a more patriotic people, a stronger Government respected for its strength and character by the world.

I regret that the committee could not report unanimously. I would like to dispose of the question and have it settled, but to me, Mr. President, the matter is of such gigantic importance that I could not consent simply to vote against the measure without expressing my reasons for casting it so. I hope that we can increase the amount of money that is to be raised by taxation. I hope we may be able to amend the measure. Never in all the history of our country will we again come to a time when we can spare the money so well as we can now.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is a member of the Finance Committee. I should like to ask his opinion as to the amount of the war profits which we should incorporate in the bill, in his judgment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. We can without shock to business raise $3,000,000,000 by taxation. This is my honest opinion about the matter. I would like to confine the taxes to income, war profits, cigars, tobacco, liquors, and certain other items. I do not object to a tax on amusements. I do not object to a tax on automobiles. That is a tax I have to pay. Keep everything that proposes a levy on luxuries. I do not object to those taxes, but I would eliminate all these vexatious things which simply challenge a man's criticism every time he meets up with it. I would do it for the good of my country and for the success of the war in which we are now engaged.

I am tempted to divert and talk about some other things, but I shall not do it at this time, because I have tried to deal with the question as dispassionately as I could and with a firm belief that I am talking for the good of my country in the expression of the views which I have submitted to the Senate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask leave to present an amendment to the income-tax provisions of the bill. I ask to have it printed, and I shall offer it at the proper time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be printed.

Mr. SIMMONS. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the pending amendment, and it will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, after line 3, strike out the remainder of the section and insert:

Thirty-five per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $500,000 and does not exceed $750,000.

Forty-five per cent upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $750,000 and does not exceed $1,000,000.

Fifty per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $1,000,000.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, I introduced this amendment because I believed that it was a more logical and equitable carrying out of the theory of the bill. As to what the amendment does, it raises the surtaxes on the last bracket carried in the bill from 33 to 35 per cent, and then adds two additional brackets on an increased scale, simply imposing a higher rate of tax on the very large incomes.

I am informed that this tax will be paid by something like 160 people who are very well able to pay it. It will raise over $40,000,000 in additional revenue.

This title as reported raises $777,700,000. If amended as suggested, it would raise $817,900,000. The estimated revenue under the present law is $360,000,000. If this amendment is agreed to, the total income-tax revenue would be estimated at $1,177,900,000. The tax paid by all individuals with incomes greater than $500,000 under the present law is $47,752,960, and under the bill as reported $147,106,710. Under the amendment it would be $187,330,000, and the total tax collected would amount on these high incomes to about 52 per cent.

I believe that this is a logical tax and one that is just and should be levied.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am in full accord with the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY]. I wish simply to call attention to the rates of each bracket that will, when this amendment is made, apply to incomes falling within those brackets.

Incomes exceeding $500,000 and not exceeding $750,000 under the existing law carry a rate of 14 per cent. Under the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island there will be added to 14 per cent 35 per cent, or a total percentage of 49 per cent on incomes of that class.

On amounts over $750,000 and not exceeding $1,000,000 the present law provides a rate of 15 per cent. Add to that the rate provided in the pending amendment of 40 per cent and it would make a total tax upon such incomes of 55 per cent.

On all incomes exceeding $1,000,000 the present law is 15 per cent and the proposed increase offered by the Senator from Rhode Island is 50 per cent, making a tax upon all incomes over $1,000,000 of 65 per cent.

Mr. President, I wish to state that that is the highest income tax that was ever imposed in all the world. I do not believe that at any time in the history of the world there has ever been a tax of that magnitude imposed upon incomes. In fact, I have looked carefully and I have been unable to find one.

As the Senator from Rhode Island said, with this amendment there will be an increase in the income tax as provided for in the bill over and above the incomes from which we are now receiving a tax of $40,375,200.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. This amendment is offered by a member of the committee and seems to be indorsed by another member of the committee. I take it that it is satisfactory to the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I can not say as to that. The committee held no meeting. I talked with the Senator from Rhode Island last evening about it. I can not say whether it is favored by the committee or not. The committee has held no meeting. That increase, when added to the amount that is already to be collected under the provisions of the bill as reported to the Senate, makes $817,000,000 to be collected from incomes alone, over and above the present income collections.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. How much increase is this over the provision of the bill for which it is a substitute?

Mr. SMOOT. Forty million three hundred and seventy-five thousand two hundred dollars.

Mr. NELSON. By making this change, then, you add $40,000,000 to the revenue?

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct.

Mr. NELSON. On those three items?

Mr. SMOOT. On incomes above $500,000 per year.

Mr. President, as I stated, I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator a question? How much will we then raise by this bill from the income-tax provisions alone?

Mr. SMOOT. Eight hundred and seventeen million nine hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. BORAH. How much is England raising at present by incomes?

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, this is in addition to the amount we are already raising under existing law.

Mr. BORAH. That is not the question I asked the Senator. The Senator misunderstood me. How much is England raising by an income-tax law?

Mr. SMOOT. I thought the Senator had reference to this bill.

Mr. BORAH. No.

Mr. SMOOT. Something over a billion dollars.

Mr. BORAH. What is the amount that England is raising this year under her law?

Mr. SMOOT. I thought I had the estimated amount with me, but I have not. However, I will say to the Senator it is a less amount than we will raise under this bill and existing law.

Mr. BORAH. England is raising, according to my recollection, although I am never certain as to my figures, something over a billion dollars.

Mr. SMOOT. It is over a billion.

Mr. BORAH. England has about 42 per cent of our population; she has about $80,000,000,000 of wealth and we have about $220,000,000,000 to $300,000,000,000. So even with the figures which are submitted with this amendment we are not yet by any means raising the amount of income tax which England is raising.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator I do not believe he himself would approve of the plan of raising incomes that England is following. We have a greater exemption than England has. England begins on her smaller incomes and imposes greater taxes upon them than this bill provides, and upon small incomes is where she gets a greater part of her revenue.

Mr. BORAH. But England has not so many large incomes from which to draw or perhaps she would change her program.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that, in proportion to the number of business concerns and her population, England has as great a percentage of large incomes as are found in the United States.

Mr. BORAH. I do not care to argue against this amendment, because I am in favor of it. My only objection to it is that it does not go far enough.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to say to the Senator from Idaho that England raises £205,000,000, equal to about $1,000,000,000. We will raise under this bill and the existing law $1,177,000,000 from incomes.

Mr. BORAH. When you take into consideration the wealth of England and compare it with the wealth of the United States we are not by any means reaching the income tax which England imposes. The Senator from Utah said it was the largest income tax ever imposed. As to a particular rate upon a particular amount that may be true, but in dealing with it as a whole it is not true by any means.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. I simply want to add to what the Senator from Idaho stated that the best authority I have been able to find estimates that the incomes in England are about $12,500,000,000 anually, while in this country they are over $50,000,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. I take it for granted the Senator from Idaho understood the statement I made when I stated that 65 per cent was the highest rate of income tax imposed in any country in the world, and that implied all incomes over $1,000,000 as provided for in this bill.

Mr. BORAH. It is not 65 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; it is 65 per cent over a million dollars. It is a tax to be imposed upon all incomes in the United States if the amendment is adopted, and the highest rate imposed in England is 42½ per cent.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. As I understand it, the incomes over $650 in England are subject to an income tax.

Mr. SMOOT. They are.

Mr. NELSON. All incomes.

Mr. SMOOT. All incomes; and not only that. I will say to the Senator that the higher rates begin upon the lower incomes of England, and that is where she raises the great bulk of her incomes, while with the bill and this amendment added to it the great bulk of the incomes will come after the income reaches $50,000 a year.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator this question? The difference is that England begins to tax her incomes of $650 and the rate on her taxation of income below an income, say, of $600,000 is greater than our rate, and she gets her money largely by taxing the smaller incomes. Does it not appeal to the Senator as being wiser to put this tax on greater incomes?

Mr. SMOOT. That is what we are doing. We are putting a greater taxation on larger incomes, and we say all incomes over a million dollars shall pay 65 per cent.

Mr. FLETCHER. The point that the Senator makes seems to be that it is the highest income tax ever levied by any country, but it only applies to incomes exceeding this amount.

Mr. SMOOT. One million dollars per annum.

Mr. FLETCHER. One million dollars per annum.

Mr. SMOOT. As I stated.

Mr. FLETCHER. The high rate imposed by this bill does not apply to the smaller incomes.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, as stated by the Senator, under the English system they begin by levying a tax at $650. The normal income tax in England is 25 per cent. The surtax is very small compared with the normal. They raise the bulk of their income tax in England upon the smaller incomes instead of upon the larger incomes, as we propose in this bill. Then, there is another difference and a very striking one to me. In this country we have subdivisions. We have 48 great subdivisions, and most of those subdivisions tax the incomes of the people. In England they have no such subdivision in which taxes on incomes are imposed.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I have very great respect for the report made by the majority of the committee. I have, of course, very high appreciation of the efforts of the minority, and I know the patriotism which stimulated their work and the recommendation that can be said to be in opposition to the majority report.

Mr. President, this committee, as has been observed by many Senators, went about their work without any partisan chart. They sought to accomplish the result without any stimulus of political opposition or political advantage. To the work of all this committee there must go, of course, a high degree of appreciation and an unstinted expression of approval for their patriotism. If errors have been made, as necessarily they must have been made, they have been made for lack of information or as a result of misinformation that frequently comes to a committee from those who ask hearings and deliberately mislead. There are classes of people who get hearings under the flattering consolation to themselves that they have some form of ingenuity by which they may trick the hearer and mislead the result. The ordinary man who comes to a committee who is engaged in some occupation or business flatters himself that he is so skilled in that particular line that he will be able to convince against the wisdom of the committee or to achieve in the particular purpose he has covertly to accomplish.

Then, sir, there are those who add to this the flattering unction to themselves that they are the sole possessors of all knowledge upon the question, and the committee being "lawyers," public men, "politicians," are essentially ignorant of these matters. In this way, sir, it is impossible for the majority or the minority of a legislative committee to be correctly informed. Yielding to their constituents and to that presumption of honesty, which the representative should ever do, the committeeman finds himself greatly imposed upon, deliberately betrayed, designedly tricked.

Mr. President, on no subject has that performance been more repeatedly dramatized than in the matter of representations as to incomes. There has been more ingenious lying deliberately perpetrated to the face of the representatives on the Finance Committee from time to time by men touching their incomes than could be conceived as could come from men of honor or men of business standing. Men who would shrink from petty lying in the ordinary affairs of their lives and who hold themselves up as worthy of the approval of their fellow man in the communities where they live, who sedately march in solemn procession behind the collection plate through the aisles of the holy church of God, carrying with them the atmosphere of, "Behold, how much holier I am than thou," will promptly come from that Sunday service to this body of men, and, under the guise of business necessity, justify a form of lying which in other forums would subject them to the charge of perjury and to the pains and penalties thereof.

Mr. President, it is because of that condition that errors have been made by both the majority and the minority of the committee. The men serving in these public bodies are trying to give this country all the taxes they can give them, consistent with the welfare of business; conscious that the country has to bear a great burden and that the burden of taxation that may be laid, however heavy, is justified.

Mr. President, I may startle you to tell you that there in the Treasury Department at this hour while I am speaking is the established proof of $300,000,000 swindled out of this Government by perjury, fraud, deception, and different forms of commercial and personal trickery under the income-tax returns. Had there been common honesty on the part of that set of men who prated loudly about the "honor of the Republic" and cried in tones of echo throughout the world for war, there would not have been the necessity for the committees on both sides in their honest endeavors to levy this burden that is now apparently justified.

The eminent junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] said he would find a greater satisfaction in supporting one form or the other of the taxes proposed if he could but be content in his mind as to the manner in which the money is to be expended. Mr. President, had there been more fidelity to law and more patriotism displayed by a certain set of very wealthy individuals in this country, and had they, as a result of such action paid their just proportion under the income-tax law, we would have been able to have had by this time such preparation for national defense that the eye of the Senator from Michigan or that of any other Senator from any State could have beheld it gratified at the result.

Mr. President, the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] tenders an amendment, being himself a member of the committee, increasing the income tax of individuals. He has conferred with Senators as to the amendment, and he has given the subject his personal investigation. The eminent chairman of the committee has refused to lay his hand or voice, in his official capacity, against the independent judgment of any Senator either of the committee or of the body, and in matters of this kind has expressed himself everywhere that it is a question of individual opinion guided by the sense that each Senator feels to his constituency and to his oath of duty. In the pursuit of what I feel to be my duty, I want to support the amendment tendered by the Senator from Rhode Island and to support the proposed increase of the tax on incomes.

I trust the junior Senator from Rhode Island will pardon the personal reference when I say it is but fair to him to have the attention of the country called to who he is. The scion of a family of great wealth, it is known, as a matter of history, that he himself, by inheritance and otherwise, the results of his own business industry, can be said to be one of the men who will suffer most—if "suffer" is to be the word—by the very amendment he tenders. His household and family, collateral and direct, will be among those who must contribute as the result of the very amendment tendered by the Senator from Rhode Island. I should like to commend this example to another class of rich men who have done all they could to avoid the tax. I wish that they might behold the public representative who himself will have to pay and of those who bear affinity to him, presenting the example of not only voluntary contribution but of an effort to have the law so adjusted that even his collaterals may not escape it.

Mr. President, the increase of the income tax will accomplish two purposes I assure you very necessary in this hour: First, as the proposed increase does not lay its burden upon the small income, and surely levies no increased income tax upon incomes less than $100,000, a man realizing an income from his industry, from his undertaking, that is ordinary or small will feel that he has not been subjected to a discriminating tax, and will feel that the large interests have not been made exempt; he will behold that the very large profits coming out of him who is engaged in undertakings are being taxed, and taxed to the very great volume necessary in the equity of government; he will feel somewhat content; he will feel composed; and if he should feel that the profits were not being reached to the full extent that he might hope hereafter they should be, he will harbor to himself the consolation that they will be reached later when the necessities require, and will have the present satisfaction of knowing that private incomes of large wealth that he sees luxuriously and extravagantly dissipated on the nonessentials of life are at last being laid hold of by a Government that permitted their possessors the methods by which they earned it, and are being taxed to maintain the soldiers in the field, the Government at home, and to pay the burdens and expenses of the encounter upon which we have entered.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. LEWIS. I do.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, I appreciate the argument of the Senator from Illinois concerning the feeling of the man paying a tax on a small income as to the effect of this amendment, namely, that he is receiving a square deal, but I should also like to say to the Senator that, while I appreciate very much the complimentary things he has said about me, I can not claim such wealth as he imputes to me, or any credit that might come to me for voting for this tax, as it will not touch me personally.

I introduced the amendment because I thought that it was sound and just, but I do not think, in all honesty, I can claim the credit which has been given me by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. It may be, Mr. President, that the Senator from Rhode Island does not wish to have it appear that he would take a personal credit to his people for doing his duty, nor was it my intent that that should be capitalized by him or anyone else politically. I was tendering what is a common well-known fact here, that, while the Senator is too delicate a gentleman to make a boast or allow one to be made concerning his personal possessions, it is in evidence to a great many men that here in this public body, so oft maligned and abused, are the evidences from both sides of the Chamber of a patriotism that ever consents to submit itself to the burden of government, while those on the outside, who slander the body, are ever willing by the methods of perjury to avoid their responsibility. Only for that, sir, did I make the allusion at all.

Mr. President, I was saying not only will we by passing this amendment console the man of small income with the feeling that he has not been discriminated against, but we shall also make him feel that those larger incomes have been laid hold of and made to bear the burden of government which he has so long been forced, by something of a discriminating policy of government, to have wholly to bear.

Mr. President, two things will follow to this Government if we do not heed the effect that would be caused by even an inadvertent exemption of large fortunes: First, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] appropriately made an allusion to those 48 bodies of this Republic where each sovereignty has the right to levy an income tax, as many of them are doing, and as many others of them are levying an inheritance tax. If we, for any reason sufficient to ourselves, allow these incomes the exemption which the people of the States feel are unjust, they will summon their local legislatures and levy the burden of tax upon these possessors of wealth who live within those States. They will put it upon two grounds: First, upon the ground of their sovereign control of the money within the realm of each State; second, upon the recognition of their local State council of defense for the defense of the State, having a right to prepare, now that all the States are in war, to the full extent that the sovereignty of the State will permit in the maintenance of its militia in provision for national defense and defense against State invasion.

Let no man flatter himself that any court would come to the rescue of the subjects of the law under the specious advocacy of "unconstitutionality." That tent of refuge has been availed of too long and in too many questionable instances not to have awakened the contempt of a large and sensible element of our multitude.

Second, sir, there is in this community to-day a great distrust awakened because of the conduct of the possessors of certain of the necessary raw materials of human existence—coal, iron, steel, and lumber. These, with other essentials at this time so necessary to the welfare of this country and so in demand for the just and proper prosecution of this war, will be laid hold of by strong and forcible hands if we allow the possessors of them and who obtain large incomes from them to escape taxation or to escape what the country feels is a fair taxation. Conscious that it may not remedy our error, but carrying in their bosoms a resentment against us, and with the knowledge that only at an annual election from time to time they will have opportunity to express that antagonism, the people will summarily rise, and in some form, either through their State organizations or by some voice through this congressional body, seize with a violent hand these great properties in this country of coal, lumber, iron, steel, and oil, and, sir, by proper form of law appropriate them for the uses of the Government, leaving only the provision of a form of compensation that will be adjusted by a jury in the respective localities where these particular commodities are found.

While we respect the jury system and regard it as a great fundamental security and one of the great fundamental guaranties of government, let us not be blind to the plain fact that juries, inheriting the prejudices prevailing in their communities against such institutions who have held up their country and its citizens by such exorbitant prices, will not do justice—not, sir, that they are unjust by nature, but their verdict would be a mere response to the popular feeling in the community from whence that jury is drawn, and the amount given to the owner of the property will not be just compensation under such atmosphere.

While we would punish the monopolist and execrate him with our indignation for the injustice he does his country in raising prices to where he would deprive it of its independence and its sovereignty by denying it the opportunity of the defense in its hour of trial and travail, we still, sir, true to our oaths and to the doctrine of the law, would not wish to confiscate the property nor allow it to be confiscated by an agency that may take the name even of a jury.

Mr. President, in order to avoid what seems to me—and I speak for my own self only, of course—the approaching condition that is coming hourly upon this Republic, when the populace will rise through the agencies through which they speak and seize with force and violence these instrumentalities of raw material necessary for the welfare of the Republic, in order to prevent the owners through extortionate rates from depriving the Republic of the means of self-defense, we should adopt the method that is now proposed by laying a tax upon the incomes—the swollen incomes, the excessive incomes—born to these who possess this kind of property and its cognate kind, who draw their incomes from the contributions of the people who must pay such high prices for their necessities; we should levy this tax and obtain a fund sufficient to meet the objects of the Government; then, sir, we have accomplished the two things which I beg again respectfully to invite to the attention of my colleagues: We appease the plain mind; we quell its revolt; we satisfy the sense of justice on the part of the medium and plain intermediate citizen; we likewise, sir, give security to the property of these people who take their incomes from such substances by levying these taxes upon their incomes, and, if they are too blind to see it now, they will learn it hereafter. Finally, sir, we do a great deal in an hour like this to steady the Government upon the constitutional base upon which it is erected, and still maintain that sovereignty of law without which this Government nor any other can long endure.

For the reasons, sir, that I have given, the security this increase of the tax on large incomes will give the popular mind, the justice it will give to property, and the defense it will give to the Nation, I support the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to ask a question before this amendment is disposed of with reference to the parliamentary situation. Do I understand that the committee amendments have been disposed of?

Mr. SIMMONS. No, Mr. President, I will state to the Senator that the committee amendment to this section is pending, and this is offered as an amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. BORAH. If the amendment that is being offered to the committee amendment is adopted, does that leave it still open to amendment?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. So that other amendments can be offered?

Mr. SIMMONS. Undoubtedly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I take it, from the inquiry, that an amendment to the amendment would not now be in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would not.

Mr. KENYON. I had intended to offer, Mr. President, and shall offer at some time when the parliamentary situation arises when it can be done, an amendment to increase the per cent provided in the Gerry amendment from 35 per cent, in line 1, to 60 per cent; from 45 per cent, in line 4, to 70 per cent; and from 50 per cent, in line 7, to 90 per cent. I do not know just how that parliamentary situation may arise.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, if the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island is adopted, then, of course, he could offer an amendment to the bill as amended.

Mr. KENYON. But I can not offer an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. SIMMONS. No.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I should like to have the amendment read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, after line 3, it is proposed to strike out:

Forty-one and twenty-five one-hundredths per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $500,000 and does not exceed $1,000,000.

Forty-five per cent upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $1,000,000.

And insert:

Thirty-five per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $500,000 and does not exceed $750,000.

Forty-five per cent upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $750,000 and does not exceed $1,000,000.

Fifty per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $1,000,000.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. As I understand, this amendment is offered as a substitute for the committee amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If the substitute comes to a vote and is adopted, then is it open to amendment as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the amendment is not offered as a substitute.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is offered as a substitute for certain provisions.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; there is no provision in the committee amendment like the one offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is an amendment to strike out and insert.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is an amendment to strike out and insert.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; it is to strike out two brackets and insert three brackets in place of it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I desire to ask if this amendment is adopted, then will an amendment increasing the amount provided in the amendment be in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As the Chair understands the situation, this is an amendment to an amendment on the part of the committee as the bill came from the House. It is an amendment to the amendment offered by the committee. The motion on the part of the Senator from Rhode Island is to strike out and insert. If his amendment shall be adopted, then the question will be on the amendment offered by the committee as amended by the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island, and then that amendment will be open to amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Including the provision presented by the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gronna	Lewis	Robinson
Bankhead	Hale	McKellar	Saulsbury
Borah	Harding	McNary	Shafroth
Brady	Hardwick	Martin	Sheppard
Broussard	Hollis	Nelson	Sherman
Calder	Husting	New	Simmons
Chamberlain	James	Norris	Smith, Md.
Colt	Johnson, Cal.	Overman	Smoot
Culberson	Jones, N. Mex.	Owen	Sutherland
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Page	Swanson
Dillingham	Kendrick	Penrose	Townsend
Fletcher	Kenyon	Phelan	Trammell
France	Kirby	Pittman	Vardaman
Frelinghuysen	Knox	Poindexter	Watson
Gerry	La Follette	Pomerene	Wolcott

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The Chair desires to say to the Senator from Iowa that his attention has been called to the fact that the amendment presented by the Senator from Rhode Island is not an amendment to strike out the committee amendment. The committee amendment has not been adopted. The amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island is an amendment to strike out the original text of the bill as it came from the House, and therefore the amendment is open to amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is there not a standing unanimous-consent agreement that the committee amendments must all be disposed of first, before Members have the right to offer amendments?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There was such an agreement; but with the consent of the chairman of the committee and by unanimous consent the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] was allowed to offer this amendment, so that it is pending.

Mr. NORRIS. That was done by unanimous consent?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is so informed.

Mr. BORAH. No, Mr. President; there was no unanimous consent.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Chair is mistaken about that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has only the information which he gets from the clerks at the desk.

Mr. SIMMONS. The standing order of the Senate, as I understand, is that the committee amendments shall be first considered; but when a committee amendment is being considered under that order it is my understanding that the committee amendment can be amended.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes; I understand that; but this is not an amendment to a committee amendment, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so ruled after an examination of the text.

Mr. BORAH. This is an amendment to the original bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is a motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. SIMMONS. The committee amendment to this income-tax schedule begins on page 3, and it amends the House bill in every schedule down to line 6 on page 4, and then it strikes out lines 7 and 8 of the House bill. I take it that those are the committee amendments.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I understand that the Chair has ruled that this is not an amendment to the committee amendment, but it is an amendment to the original bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment reads as follows:

On page 4, after line 3, strike out the remainder of the section and insert certain matter.

The committee amendment as reported to the Senate proposes, on line 1, to strike out "thirty-seven and five tenths" and insert in place thereof "thirty-one," and also, on line 4, to strike out "forty-one and twenty-five one hundredths" and insert "thirty-three"; but the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island strikes out all the lines of this section as reported from the House. Therefore it is a motion to strike out and insert his amendment in lieu of the matter that came from the House. Therefore it is open to amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, Mr. President, it follows that it is not an amendment to the committee amendment, and on its face it strikes out part of the House bill; so it is not an amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. The committee amendment is the bracket, beginning on line 4, by striking out "forty-one and twenty-five one hundredths" and inserting "thirty-three."

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, this is an amendment, as I understand, to that part of the committee's amendment in the nature of a motion to strike it out and insert.

Mr. NORRIS. But the Senator will notice that the very next lines, line 5 and line 6, down to and including $500,000, the committee does not pretend to amend, and this amendment strikes that out as well as what the committee has changed.

Mr. SIMMONS. Line 7 the committee did amend by striking it out.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and line 8. But I am calling the Senator's attention to line 5 and the first half of line 6, which the committee does not pretend to amend, and which the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island strikes out.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, why would not the Senator from Rhode Island, in order that the parliamentary rights of all parties may be protected, be willing to withdraw his amendment until the committee amendments are disposed of?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island does not propose to amend the committee amendment. He proposes to amend the House text.

Mr. NORRIS. That is not in order under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, this is an amendment to substitute for amendments made by the committee. We can not dispose of these paragraphs in the bill without acting upon the committee amendments; and so, when we come to act on the committee amendments, we have a right to amend those amendments under the rule that we have adopted. This is an amendment to or a substitute for the committee amendments, and hence it is properly before us.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, this is a proposal to amend a part of the original bill. It does not confine itself to the committee amendment, but it amends the original bill also. The result of the situation is going to be that other amendments are going to be shut out hereafter, under the ruling of the Chair. Now, there is no necessity for that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the ruling of the Chair, they are not shut out.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, this involves amendments made by the committee, and we can not dispose of those amendments without amending them by this amendment. If the Senator can not offer it when these amendments are up, he can not offer it until we get out of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, we have an agreement here that the committee amendments shall be first disposed of. Now we are proceeding to amend the original bill before that is carried out. In my judgment, that is not in accordance with the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. SIMMONS. There has been no unaniomus-consent agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the RECORD of yesterday, showing the unanimous consent given without objection.

The SECRETARY. On page 6220 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 21, the following appears:

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk to the income-tax title of the pending bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, after line 3, it is proposed to strike out the remainder of the section and to insert:

"Forty-five per cent per anum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $500,000 and does not exceed $750,000.

"Forty-five per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $750 000 and does not exceed $1,000,000.

"Fifty per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $1,000,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand that the Senator from Rhode Island asks to tender the amendment for action at this time?

Mr. GERRY. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is that agreeable to the chairman of the committee?

Mr. SIMMONS That is entirely agreeable to me. I do not think we should vote upon the amendment this afternoon, because there are few Senators present, and I think there was a general understanding that we would not vote upon the amendments to these sections until to-morrow. For that reason I will now ask that the bill be temporarily laid aside, with the understanding that this will be the pending amendment when the bill is taken up to-morrow.

Mr. GERRY. That is entirely satisfactory to me, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the revenue bill will be temporarily laid aside, with the understanding that the amendment tendered by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] will be in order to-morrow morning.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I should like to state the situation as it occurred.

I was in the chair at the time the matter came up, and I had in mind the fact that the chairman of the committee had asked unanimous consent that committee amendments should be first considered. I therefore asked him if this was agreeable to him. Then I was very careful to state that, without objection, this would be the pending amendment to-morrow, because I thought it should be done by unanimous agreement, and that is now the situation; but I do not understand that that goes beyond this particular amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely; but the RECORD does not show any unanimous-consent agreement. It shows an understanding upon the part of the chairman and the Senator offering the amendment.

Mr. HOLLIS. But it was stated that, without objection, that would be done, and there was no objection.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely; but that does not constitute a change of a unanimous-consent agreement. You can not change a unanimous-consent agreement in that way. Indeed, you can not change it at all.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, a unanimous-consent agreement to consider committee amendments first, I understand, can be changed by unanimous consent.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. When the Senator was in the chair, and this amendment was offered, did he understand that it was an amendment to the committee amendment?

Mr. HOLLIS. I did understand that it was an amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, if that be true, Mr. President, it seems to me it makes everything consistent, because it develops now that it is not an amendment to the committee amendment, so it would not have the effect, if that was the understanding at that time, of changing a unanimous-consent agreement that even the chairman of the committee has no right to set aside.

Mr. HOLLIS. Yes; but the trouble with that is this: If it were an amendment to the committee amendment, no unanimous-consent agreement was necessary; but the occupant of the chair, without knowing the exact parliamentary situation, because he had not looked it up and no one had drawn attention to it, was careful to put it in such form that it was done by unanimous consent, as the Chair understood it.

Mr. NORRIS. It was done with the understanding, however, as I understand the Senator, that it was an amendment to a committee amendment, which it now develops it was not.

Mr. HOLLIS. If it had been, it would not have been necessary to have unanimous consent to consider it. The Chair did it in that way so that everyone's rights would be saved, and it would be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, in view of the fact that we have a new method of getting unanimous consents of the Senate, may I submit this question to the Chair: Is this amendment now open to amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has so ruled.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I offer to this amendment the following amendment:

Strike out, on line 1, the word "thirty-five" and insert the word "fifty."

Strike out, on line 4, the word "forty-five" and insert "seventy."

Strike out, on line 7, the word "fifty" and insert the word "ninety."

The purpose of the amendment is to this effect: That where incomes exceed $500,000 and do not exceed $750,000 there shall be taken 50 per cent of those incomes above the $500,000. The second provision—and these are all interwoven, so I think it should be one amendment—would mean that in the case of incomes above $750,000 and up to $1,000,000, the part above $750,000 would be taxed 70 per cent. The third provision would mean that where the income exceeds $1,000,000, 90 per cent of the amount above $1,000,000 would be taken in taxes.

I do not propose to discuss this at all. I think every Senator has his mind pretty well made up.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. KENYON. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator realize that this is merely an additional tax which will be added to the present normal income tax and the surtax, so that the last rate would be over 100 per cent?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the rates, if his amendment were adopted, would be as follows:

On incomes exceeding $500,000 and not exceeding $750,000, if the amendment of the Senator from Iowa were adopted, there would be imposed a tax of 64 per cent. There is 14 per cent imposed already under existing law.

On incomes exceeding $750,000 and not exceeding $1,000,000, the tax under the amendment of the Senator from Iowa would be 85 per cent.

On incomes of $1,000,000 and over, the 90 per cent, with the present tax added, would amount to a total of 105 per cent. Of course, you can not take more than 100 per cent.

Mr. KENYON. Well, Mr. President——

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, it shows the profound investigation with which these amendments are offered.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, the sarcastic suggestions are well received. I had, it is true, overlooked the present tax of 15 per cent. The present amendment is so worded as to be ambiguous. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has worked out an amendment more carefully than this has been worked out, and will offer it later, so I think I will withdraw this amendment for the present. Otherwise, I will change the figures to 80 instead of 90.

I, however, withdraw my amendment at this time.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, let the amendment stand as a monument in this discussion to an effort to take 5 per cent more than the total income of an individual.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, the amendment was offered with no such purpose, of course, and attempts no such thing. I concede that perhaps it should have been more carefully considered. The amendment was offered for the purpose of placing the Senate on record, at least, as to whether or not these tremendous incomes are to bear a fairer proportion of taxation than has been provided by the committee. I contend, and did at the time of the conscription bill, that where we conscripted boys in this country to go to war, we ought to conscript the great wealth of this country and the great incomes of this country, and I stated at that time that I should offer an amendment at the proper time to conscript all incomes over $100,000 during the period of this war. I propose to do that before we get through with this bill if opportunity arises. My only purpose in offering this amendment was to put the Senate on record. I had no thought of its passage. There has been so much confusion, however, as to this Gerry amendment and its parliamentary situation that I prefer to withdraw it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I should like to understand the parliamentary situation.

I have some amendments which I desire to offer to the income-tax provisions of this bill. I do not wish to be excluded from the opportunity of offering them and having a vote upon them. I had supposed that the order of considering the bill required first a disposition of the committee amendments. I understand that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] amends the provisions of the House bill for which the committee amendments are a substitute.

I have three amendments, one after another, which I propose to offer, if I can bring them within parliamentary procedure here, to the income-tax provisions of this bill; and I want at this time to ascertain, if I can, whether I shall have that opportunity, provided a vote is taken upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Chair, in order to help the Senator from Wisconsin to get an answer, notwithstanding the fact that we have agreed to vote upon the committee amendments first, where the committee moves to strike out and insert, if under Rule XVIII the matter to be stricken out is not amendable now and if amendments to that part should not be taken up first?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island. That amendment is now open to amendment, the Chair has held.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, that does not answer the question of the Senator from Wisconsin; and the question I propounded was if, under Rule XVIII, the Senator could not, after this amendment is disposed of, offer an amendment to any part of the bill that is stricken out by committee amendment?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to submit an inquiry to the Chair that in my judgment will cover the situation. I think we are all anxious to have it cleared up properly. I ask this question: After the committee amendments are disposed of, not only in this section but in all the others, would it then be in order, when we come to individual amendments, for a Senator to offer an amendment changing the schedule of the income-tax provisions of the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If it tends to strike out and insert, surely, under Rule XVIII, you may strike out the whole section. That is provided for under the rule.

Mr. NORRIS. To strike out and insert a new set of rates?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under Rule XVIII; yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Then, Mr. President, I think that answers my question—that after the committee amendments to the House bill have been disposed of and perfected and the work of the Senate completed upon them, I would then have a right to move to strike them out and substitute another provision for them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator moved to strike out the whole section; yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, I do not——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. You can not amend the committee amendment, but you can move to strike out and insert, under the rule.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I want to suggest that in the interest of fairness, and to avoid any misunderstanding or any suggestion that an attempt is being made to shut off amendments, the Senator from Rhode Island withdraw his amendment and put us back in the status we were in before it was offered, because it evidently was not the idea of many Senators that a unanimous censent was being given last night. Furthermore, this is an amendment that is different from anything that we have ever had, at least in my experience here. It takes up two or three committee amendments and proposes to strike them out, and substantially amends other parts of the bill which are then proposed as substitutes. Now, then, if we were to take this up in the regular order, we would take up the amendment on line 4, page 4, to strike out "forty-one and twenty-five one hundredths" and insert "thirty-three," and pass upon that. That is one committee amendment. Then here is another committee amendment, in line 6, to strike out "and does not exceed one million dollars." That is one committee amendment. We would pass on that, and then the next committee amendment is to strike out lines 7 and 8. That is another committee amendment. Now, here is a sort of blanket proposition to act upon three or four different committee amendments, and strike out a part of the substance of the bill and insert another one.

I want to say that it does not look just exactly right to me. I do not know how it does to others. In the interest of fairness, and to have no misunderstanding, I suggest that the Senator from Rhode Island withdraw his amendment, and let us start out on these committee amendments under the unanimous-consent agreement that we have made and that everybody supposed we were following.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] offered this amendment yesterday afternoon with the understanding that his amendment to these different brackets constituted practically one amendment, and that it would be competent for him to offer his amendment in the form that he did offer it. It now develops, under the ruling of the Chair, that each of these brackets is to be taken as a separate and independent section for the purposes of amendment. Under the order under which we are operating the committee amendments are to be first disposed of. I have been exercising the privilege ordinarily accorded to the chairmen of committees to take up these amendments somewhat out of their order, and I suggest that we take up the amendment on page 4, beginning with line 4, and consider that at this time. The amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island can be easily framed so as to make it an amendment to that section.

I want to say, Mr. President, that I have no purpose and no thought of trying to crowd out the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin. I knew the Senator was going to offer an amendment, and I told him that I thought we would get to a vote on those amendments to-day. I certainly would not want to take advantage of any parliamentary situation that would interfere with his offering his amendment. Under the ruling of the Chair, I understand he would have to offer his amendment to each one of these brackets as we reach them, and he could not offer it as an amendment to the several brackets.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has ruled that he could move to strike out all the section and offer a substitute under Rule XVIII.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator, I think there would be no difficulty about the situation if the Senator from Wisconsin would offer that portion of his amendment that applies to this particular provision in the bill. The Senator from Rhode Island has offered an amendment to the bill covering the provisions from line 4 to line 8, inclusive, of page 4. The Senator from Wisconsin has offered an amendment which includes that portion of this bill. For instance, on page 6 of his amendment, beginning at line 16, he could offer that portion of his amendment as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island and get a vote on it. I inquire of the Senator from Wisconsin whether or not he would care to do that?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I prefer to offer my amendment as a whole. Of course, I can stand it, if the Senate can, to have a roll call on every one of the percentages which I propose in the amendment, in order to get them all before the Senate and a record on all of them; but that would consume unnecessary time.

Mr. FLETCHER. That could be done, and perhaps it would be better to do that; but it would be entirely in order for the Senator to offer his amendment beginning in line 16, page 6, to the amendment now pending, and take a vote on it as a substitute for the proposal of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, may I make a suggestion to the chairman of the committee? I do not believe there will be any objection to it at all, because every Senator here wants to arrive at the same object.

The Senator from Wisconsin desires to offer, and I think he is right in that, a substitute for Title I. Of course, under Rule XVIII, he has a right to do that, and he wants a vote upon that as a whole; but before doing that, the House provision as amended by the Senate ought to be perfected. Now, why not ask unanimous consent that the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island be voted upon at this time? That is a way of perfecting the House provision, and I do not believe any Senator would object to voting upon that right at this time.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I think it would be a very much simpler way to vote upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin en bloc, because it affects a dozen sections of the bill, and I think it would conserve time to vote on it en bloc. That is the way I had supposed we would do, but under the ruling of the Chair I doubt whether we can do that. Now, the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island perfects two of these brackets. I had supposed that we would vote upon that as one proposition, but under the ruling of the Chair I do not know whether that can be done or not. In that situation, it may be that the best solution of the matter would be the unanimous consent which the Senator from Utah suggests. Another solution of it would be to act upon the committee amendments, perfect all of them, and then let this amendment be acted on by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair suggests that as the Senator from North Carolina states, that will be the result anyway. Therefore, if the Senator would divide it, we could go on with the committee amendments as they are offered and perfected, and then the amendment would be in order. That is only a suggestion from the Chair, however.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, allow me to call the Chair's attention to the fact that if we adopt the committee amendment, on page 4, line 4, where it strikes out "forty-one and twenty-five one-hundredths" and inserts "thirty-three," then, if we should undertake to amend that after we had adopted it, it could not be done until the bill reached the Senate. Therefore it seems to me that the proper thing to do is to ask unanimous consent that the Senate vote now upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island. That will clear it up, and then you can commence with your amendments.

Mr. SIMMONS. I make that request. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now vote upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does not require any unanimous consent. It is before the Senate to be voted upon unless some one offers an amendment to it.

Mr. LEWIS. In the meantime, may I ask the chairman of the committee if there is any understanding by which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] would be displaced from any position that he had by agreement by presenting the Gerry amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin will be fully protected by the rules of the Senate.

Mr. LEWIS. I understood the Senator from North Carolina to make some allusion to the Senator from Wisconsin, and I know the Senator from North Carolina has no desire to displace him.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Wisconsin did not offer his amendment to the bill until this morning.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have not offered it at the present time.

Mr. LEWIS. We will then vote on the Gerry amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It seems to me that the orderly way to proceed would be to follow the course which has been pursued ever since the bill has been before the Senate, of perfecting the committee amendments first. There is no occasion for undue haste for a vote upon the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island as far as I can see, and I do not see any reason why we may not go on and perfect the committee amendments and then take up the other propositions in their order.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator that under the ruling of the Chair that is all we can do. The question, then, is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; that is not the question, with all deference to the Chair.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to call attention to the fact that unless this amendment comes from the committee, any Member of the Senate can object to the consideration of it now, and it will be necessary, as the Senator from Utah suggested, to ask unanimous consent to consider the amendment now.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is not a committee amendment.

Mr. GRONNA. It is not a committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As stated by the Senator, the amendment pending by unanimous consent is the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island. If the Senator from Rhode Island will withdraw it, that will be the end of it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island may be withdrawn and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the committee amendments under the regular rule of the Senate.

Mr. NELSON. I shall object to that.

Mr. GERRY. I move to strike out the words "thirty-three" in page 4, line 4, and insert in lieu thereof the words "thirty-five."

Mr. FLETCHER. All that comes up on the action of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Rhode Island to withdraw his amendment and offer another amendment.

Mr. GERRY. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. Before that is done may I have the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island? It is not my intention to object to unanimous consent. If the Senator from Rhode Island will ask unanimous consent to have his amendment considered, I shall not object, but I do insist that in order to get the amendment before the body he must ask unanimous consent.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I trust the Senator from Rhode Island will not withdraw his amendment. It is properly before the Senate and we are entitled to vote upon it unless somebody wants to debate it. It does not require any unanimous consent, and unless somebody wants to debate it we must vote.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of my amendment so as to settle all questions about it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the unanimous consent stated by the former occupant of the chair yesterday afternoon, that the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island should be pending this morning, by unanimous consent the amendment is now pending. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. NELSON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], which I transfer to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS (when Mr. GALLINGER'S name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. Were he present he would vote "yea."

Mr. PENROSE (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. As I am informed that he is absent from the Chamber, I will withhold my vote.

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. SHAFROTH (when Mr. THOMAS'S name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of illness. I will state that he is paired with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], and that if my colleague were present and permitted to vote he would vote "yea."

Mr. LEWIS (when Mr. TILLMAN'S name was called). I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] from the Chamber. He is paired with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. If the Senator from South Carolina were present and privileged to vote, he would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the pair of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. MCCUMBER (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], but, understanding that he would vote upon this amendment the same way that I have voted, I will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. MYERS. I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], who is necessarily absent on account of illness. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING. I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]. As he is not present, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] is absent on account of illness in his family. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. HUSTING. I was requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM].

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. Not knowing his attitude upon the amendment, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 72, nays 0, as follows:

YEAS—72.

So Mr. GERRY'S amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, I wish to begin with the title "War Taxes" and have the Senate act upon the amendments of the committee as they are reached.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). Under the previous unanimous-consent agreement that will be done. The Secretary will state the first amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand now that the chairman of the committee is going to proceed with the committee amendments?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. I understand that the Senator from Wisconsin proposes to offer a substitute for the section, but I suppose he will not do that until the committee amendments are perfected

Mr. BORAH. We can proceed upon the theory now that we will dispose of the committee amendments before other amendments will be taken up.

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course, when the committee amendments are acted upon I shall have no objection to the Senator from Wisconsin offering his substitute.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely; but until the committee amendments are disposed of we will not take up other amendments.

Mr. SIMMONS. I would prefer not.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment of the Committee on Finance passed over is under the head of "Title I.—War-Income Tax," in section 1, on page 1, line 9, after the word "every," to strike out "individual" and insert "individual, a citizen or resident of the United States," so as to make the section read:

SECTION 1. That in addition to the normal tax imposed by subdivision (a) of section 1 of the act entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," approved September 8, 1916, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a like normal tax of 2 per cent upon the income of every individual, a citizen or resident of the United States, received in the calendar year 1917 and every calendar year thereafter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALDER. Is it in order now to offer an amendment to the end of the amendment just agreed to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will rule that the committee amendment has been adopted. If the amendment to the committee amendment had been offered before it was adopted, it would have been in order. Now it will not be in order until all the committee amendments have been passed upon. The Senator might make a motion to reconsider, which would doubtless be granted.

Mr. CALDER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to for the purpose of offering the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent that the vote by which the committee amendment was adopted may be reconsidered so that his amendment may be offered.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the record show that the committee amendment was adopted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I was present here at the time and voted for the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island, but I heard no vote or announcement of a vote after that. That was not a committee amendment, but was an individual amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator will permit, the Chair will state that the committee amendment on page 2 has just been adopted. The Senator from New York asked unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment was adopted on page 2, line 1. The Secretary will read the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from New York offers the following amendment: At the end of line 3, page 2, insert a proviso——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will rule that that amendment has nothing to do with the committee amendment which has just been adopted, and it will be in order after the committee amendments are acted upon. The Secretary will proceed.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill on page 2, line 4, and read as follows:

SEC. 2. That in addition to the additional tax imposed by subdivision (b) of section 1 of such act of September 8, 1916, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a like additional tax upon the income of every individual received in the calendar year 1917 and every calendar year thereafter, as follows.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Has not the bill been read once?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is now being read for committee amendments, and whenever an amendment of the committee is reached it will be considered.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I realize that, but I thought it had been read, and I could not understand why it was necessary to read it again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator ask unanimous consent that the Secretary merely read the part where changes are proposed by the committee?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not know whether there is any objection to that course. I can see no objection to proceeding with the committee amendments.

Mr. NORRIS The amendments come right along there, and we will get a better understanding of the amendments if the text of the bill is read. It was not heretofore read. It went over.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is my understanding that this part of the bill has not been read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that this part of the bill has been read once, but there evidently will be objection, and so the Chair will not state a unanimous-consent request. The Secretary will proceed.

The Secretary continued the reading, as follows:

One per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $5,000 and does not exceed $7,500;

Two per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $7,500 and does not exceed $10,000;

Three per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $10,000 and does not exceed $12,500;

Four per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $12,500 and does not exceed $15,000.

The next amendment passed over was, in section 2, page 2, line 23, before the words "per centum," to strike out "Five" and insert "Six," so as to make the clause read:

Six per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $15,000 and does not exceed $20,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that according to the opinion of the present occupant of the chair if this amendment is adopted no other amendment may be received to this particular section, but that later an amendment may be received to strike out and insert a new section for the entire section. The question is upon agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. So that there may be no misunderstanding, I understand that the ruling by the present occupant of the chair conforms with the ruling of his predecessor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not understand that the rulings are different. The Chair understands that they are exactly the same.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Chair mean by that that if this particular amendment, which strikes out "Five" and inserts "Six," is agreed to it will not be in order thereafter to change "Six" to any other number unless the amendment includes the entire section?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. NORRIS. That will extend to page 4 at the end of line 8.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes; that is the understanding of the Chair, and that is in accordance with the plain rule of the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. I wanted an understanding only. I do not know that I care particularly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, just one inquiry further. I understand that when we reach line 8, page 4, in perfecting this section of the committee report, then it will be in order to move to strike out that section and submit a substitute therefor. Now, then, after a vote upon that substitute, assuming that it is voted down, am I correct in assuming that it will then be in order to offer another and different substitute?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes; that is clearly covered by the rule.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I so understood the rule, but with the varying occupants of the chair we may get a different construction upon our rules, and I wanted to be sure for a few moments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is plainly provided in the rule that a motion to strike out and insert having been rejected a new motion to strike out and insert different matter may be entertained. The question is on striking out the word "Five" and inserting the word "Six" in line 23, page 2.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 3, line 1, before the words "per cent," to strike out "Six" and insert "Eight," so as to make the clause read:

Eight per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $20,000 and does not exceed $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 3, line 7, before the words "per cent," to strike out "Thirteen and seventy-five one-hundredths" and insert "Twelve," so as to make the clause read:

Twelve per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $60,000 and does not exceed $80,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 3, line 10, before the words "per cent," to strike out "Seventeen and five-tenths" and insert "Sixteen," so as to make the clause read:

Sixteen per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $80,000 and does not exceed $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 14, before the words "per cent," to strike out "Twenty-one and twenty-five one-hundredths" and insert "Twenty," so as to make the clause read:

Twenty per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $100,000 and does not exceed $150,000.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee why the committee reduced this amount in line 7 instead of increasing it slightly, as they did in the other cases?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the committee originally accepted the rates as they were in the House bill as reported by the Ways and Means Committee to that body. On the floor of the House what is known as the Lenroot amendment was offered and agreed to. That amendment raised the original rate of the bill as reported by the Ways and Means Committee on all incomes in excess of $40,000 by a flat increase of 25 per cent. Your committee did not accept that increase by the Lenroot amendment. These rates that are stricken out are the rates of the Lenroot amendment—that is, the rate of the Ways and Means Committee plus 25 per cent provided in the Lenroot amendment. The committee struck those out and substituted the rates of the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator will permit me, I think he ought to add that the Finance Committee adopted the original rates of the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. I stated that.

Mr. PENROSE. I beg the Senator's pardon. I was out of the Chamber for a moment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course I assume that the committee reduced the House rates because they thought they ought to be reduced and not simply because they adopted the rates that were reported by the Ways and Means Committee. It seems to me it would have been better to have followed the apparent judgment of the House than to have accepted the judgment of the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. What I meant to say to the Senator is that we finally raised the House rate beginning at incomes of $20,000. We raised all the House rates, but we did not raise them beginning with incomes of $40,000 as high as the Lenroot amendment. The Lenroot amendment begins to operate on line 7. The Senator will see we have a rate there of 12 per cent, and the rate immediately before that is 10 per cent. We have kept up the same proportion of increase we started with, but not carrying the rate so high as the Lenroot amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to ask the Senator a question. I am not especially interested in the Lenroot amendment. I think I would be in favor of that all right, but I want to know whether the committee considered 13.75 per cent on the amount from $60,000 up to $80,000 too high?

Mr. SIMMONS. The committee did regard that rate as too high.

Mr. JONES of Washington. And also the rate in the paragraph beginning in line 10?

Mr. SIMMONS. The committee regarded all the rates of the Lenroot amendment, and they are the rates beginning with line 7, as being too high.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator will yield, I just want to say at this point that the committee was not unanimous in that view, but a number of members of the committee voted to retain the House amendment known as the Lenroot amendment, myself among the number.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want an opportunity to vote against the committee amendment here striking out the amount provided by the House and inserting the lower rate, and while we have passed over the amendment in line 7 I ask unanimous consent that that be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent that the vote by which the committee amendment in line 7, page 3, was adopted may be reconsidered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the vote will be reconsidered. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The committee proposes to strike out, on page 3, line 7, the words "Thirteen and seventy-five one-hundredths" and to insert "Twelve."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. All I am going to ask, as far as I am concerned, is simply that it be put to a viva voce vote with the idea that possibly a substitute will be offered that will take care of the proposition better. I shall not ask, as far as I am concerned, that the vote shall be taken by yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt and will ask for a rising vote. [After a pause.] There are, on a division, ayes 13 and noes 11. So the amendment is adopted.

Mr. KENYON. I ask if a vote of 13 to 11 does not disclose the absence of a quorum?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does. Does the Senator from Iowa raise that point?

Mr. KENYON. I do not, unless the record raises it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I believe the statement of the Chair would have to go into the record, and that statement would raise the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. I think that is true.

Mr. SIMMONS. I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brady	Hollis	Myers	Simmons
Broussard	Husting	Nelson	Smith, Mich.
Calder	James	New	Smoot
Chamberlain	Johnson, Cal.	Norris	Sterling
Colt	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Tillman
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Page	Townsend
Dillingham	Kellogg	Penrose	Trammell
Fletcher	Kendrick	Phelan	Underwood
France	Kenyon	Poindexter	Vardaman
Frelinghuysen	Kirby	Ransdell	Wadsworth
Gerry	Knox	Reed	Watson
Gore	La Follette	Robinson	Weeks
Gronna	McKellar	Sheppard	Wolcott
Hardwick	McNary	Sherman

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The call for a division disclosed the absence of a quorum, and the Chair will now restate the question. The question is on the adoption of the committee amendment, on page 3, line 7, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 7, before the words "per cent," the Committee on Finance proposes to strike out the words "Thirteen and seventy-five one-hundredths" and insert the word "Twelve," so as to make the clause read:

Twelve per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $60,000 and does not exceed $80,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. SIMMONS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as before and vote "nay."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). By arrangement with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] I transfer my pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] and vote "yea." I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], but by arrangement with the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as on the last vote and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. PENROSE. I voted "yea" when my name was called, and I shall allow my vote to stand, because I am informed that the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], with whom I am paired and who is absent, had he been present, would have voted to sustain the committee on this amendment.

Mr. LODGE (after having voted in the affirmative). I have voted, and I shall allow my vote to stand, because the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], with whom I am paired, if present, would have voted to sustain the committee on this question.

Mr. McCUMBER (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] to the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I am requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. Were he present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. In his absence I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 35, as follows:

YEAS—31.

Calder	Kellogg	New	Smith, Mich.
Colt	Knox	Page	Smoot
Dillingham	Lewis	Penrose	Swanson
France	Lodge	Ransdell	Wadsworth
Frelinghuysen	McCumber	Saulsbury	Watson
Gerry	Martin	Shields	Weeks
Hale	Myers	Simmons	Wolcott
James	Nelson	Smith, Md.

NAYS—35.

Ashurst	Hardwick	McKellar	Sheppard
Borah	Hollis	McNary	Sherman
Brady	Husting	Norris	Smith, S. C.
Broussard	Johnson, Cal.	Phelan	Sterling
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Poindexter	Thompson
Curtis	Kendrick	Pomerene	Townsend
Fletcher	Kenyon	Reed	Trammell
Gore	Kirby	Robinson	Vardaman
Gronna	La Follette	Shafroth

NOT VOTING—30.

Bankhead	Goff	Newlands	Thomas
Beckham	Harding	Overman	Tillman
Brandegee	Hitchcock	Owen	Underwood
Culberson	Hughes	Pittman	Walsh
Cummins	Johnson, S. Dak.	Smith, Ariz.	Warren
Fall	Jones, N. Mex.	Smith, Ga.	Williams
Fernald	King	Stone
Gallinger	McLean	Sutherland

So the amendment of the committee was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the next amendment of the committee.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, as I understand, the committee amendment in line 7, on page 3, has been reconsidered and has been rejected, but the amendment in line 10, on the same page, has been adopted. So, if the Senator from Washington wants the same action taken as to that amendment, I think he will have to move a reconsideration of the vote whereby it was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment in line 10, page 3, was adopted may be reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the committee.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 10, before the words "per cent," the Committee on Finance proposes to strike out the words "Seventeen and five-tenths" and to insert "Sixteen," so as to read:

Sixteen per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $80,000 and does not exceed $100,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as before and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS (when Mr. GALLINGER's name was called). I announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. He is absent on this roll call, and I therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MYERS. I announce the same transfer of my pair as on the last vote and vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the temporary absence of the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] on official business.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], who is absent. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of sickness, and to say that he is paired with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. If present, my colleague would vote "nay."

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. He is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. If the Senator from Mississippi were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] on account of illness. He is paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. If present, my colleague would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 37, as follows:

YEAS—26.

Brandegee	James	New	Swanson
Calder	Kellogg	Page	Wadsworth
Colt	Knox	Penrose	Watson
Dillingham	Lodge	Saulsbury	Weeks
Frelinghuysen	Martin	Simmons	Wolcott
Gerry	Myers	Smith, Md.
Hale	Nelson	Smoot

NAYS—37.

Borah	Hollis	Norris	Smith, Mich.
Brady	Husting	Phelan	Smith, S. C.
Broussard	Johnson, Cal.	Poindexter	Sterling
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Ransdell	Thompson
Culberson	Kendrick	Reed	Townsend
Curtis	Kenyon	Robinson	Trammell
Fletcher	Kirby	Shafroth	Vardaman
Gore	La Follette	Sheppard
Gronna	McKellar	Sherman
Hardwick	McNary	Shields

NOT VOTING—33.

Ashurst	Harding	Newlands	Thomas
Bankhead	Hitchcock	Overman	Tillman
Beckham	Hughes	Owen	Underwood
Cummins	Johnson, S. Dak.	Pittman	Walsh
Fall	Jones, N. Mex.	Pomerene	Warren
Fernald	King	Smith, Ariz.	Williams.
France	Lewis	Smith, Ga.
Gallinger	McCumber	Stone
Goff	McLean	Sutherland

So the amendment of the committee was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the next amendment reported by the committee.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 13, the committee proposes to strike out "Twenty-one and twenty-five one-hundredths" and to insert "Twenty," so as to read:

Twenty per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $100,000 and does not exceed $150,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, while I am in accord with the committee amendment, and hope that it will be adopted, I shall not call for the yeas and nays upon the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the next amendment reported by the committee.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 16, it is proposed to strike out "Twenty-five" and to insert "Twenty-three," so as to read:

Twenty-three per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $150,000 and does not exceed $200,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the next amendment reported by the committee.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 19, it is proposed to strike out "Thirty" and insert "Twenty-six," so as to read:

Twenty-six per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $200,000 and does not exceed $250,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the next amendment reported by the committee.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 22, it is proposed to strike out "Thirty-three and seventy-five one-hundredths" and to insert "Twenty-nine," so as to read:

Twenty-nine per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $250,000 and does not exceed $300,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the next amendment reported by the committee.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 1, it is proposed to strike out "Thirty-seven and five-tenths" and to insert "Thirty-one," so as to read:

Thirty-one per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $300,000 and does not exceed $500,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, that paragraph has been agreed to, and a substitute amendment has been adopted, as I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that that paragraph was not included in the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee, on page 1, line 4.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desire to say that I did not ask for the yeas and nays on these amendments, because it is perfectly evident to me that the Senate favored what is known as the Lenroot amendment as against the rates proposed by the Finance Committee. Therefore, I thought it was unnecessary to take the time of the Senate in calling for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Has section 2 been completed?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may I ask the Secretary to read the next paragraph as it now appears in the bill, commencing on line 4?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary proceeded to read, as follows:

Thirty-five per cent per annum——

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may the Secretary read the paragraph?

Mr. SHIELDS. I will ask the Senator to allow me to make a correction before proceeding. I came into the Chamber while the yeas and nays were being concluded on the amendment on page 3, line 7, proposing to reduce from 13.75 per cent to 12 per cent the tax upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $60,000 and does not exceed $80,000, and I voted "yea" inadvertently. I voted nay on the other amendments following that, and would have voted nay on the one referred to if I had fully understood its purport. I wish to make this statement in explanation of my vote.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. May the Secretary proceed with the reading of the paragraph as it now appears in the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the closing paragraph of the section.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Of section 2?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The closing paragraph of section 2 as amended.

Mr. GERRY. I will ask unanimous consent——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask that the Secretary read the paragraph.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will proceed with the reading which has been requested and ordered.

The SECRETARY. Following the paragraph at the top of page 4, ending in line 3, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, have adopted an amendment which reads as follows:

Thirty-five per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $500,000 and does not exceed $750,000.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I simply desire to make the observation that if this provision is not corrected the surtax imposed upon incomes in excess of $500,000 will be less in rate than the surtax imposed upon incomes less than $500,000.

Mr. GERRY. I ask unanimous consent that that be changed from 35 per cent to 40 per cent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator desires to have reconsidered the vote by which the amendment was agreed to?

Mr. GERRY. I ask that the vote be reconsidered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am constrained to object to that, for the reason that I have been waiting here to offer a substitute for the whole section, and I have been at some pains to prepare the proposed substitute so as to conform to the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island, which has already been adopted. I have that now worked out and am having computations made upon it, and I prefer to have the opportunity to offer my substitute to this section just as it stands now if I can do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do that because I think we will be able to substitute a well-constructed section for this conglomeration.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Secretary has not quite finished reading the amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I thought the reading of section 2 had been completed. Am I mistaken?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not think it has been. I did not hear him read the last paragraph.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of section 2 has been completed. The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] requested the reading of a portion of the amendment which has been adopted, and, as the Chair understands, the Secretary had completed the reading.

Mr. HARDWICK. I ask the Secretary to read the entire amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At the request of the Senator from Georgia the Secretary will complete the reading of that section as amended.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, after line 3, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, agreed to the following amendment:

Thirty-five per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $500,000 and does not exceed $750,000.
Forty-five per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $750,000 and does not exceed $1,000,000.
Fifty per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $1,000,000.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I offer a substitute for the entire section, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after line 10, page 2, all of page 3, and lines 1 to 6, inclusive, of page 4, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

One per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $5,000 and does not exceed $6,000.
Two per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $6,000 and does not exceed $7,000.
Three per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $7,000 and does not exceed $8,000.
Four per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $8,000 and does not exceed $9,000.
Five per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $9,000 and does not exceed $10,000.
Six per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $10,000 and does not exceed $11,000.
Seven per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $11,000 and does not exceed $12,000.
Eight per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $12,000 and does not exceed $13,000.
Nine per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $13,000 and does not exceed $14,000.
Ten per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $14,000 and does not exceed $15,000.
Eleven per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $15,000 and does not exceed $16,000.
Twelve per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $16,000 and does not exceed $17,000.
Thirteen per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $17,000 and does not exceed $18,000.
Fourteen per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $18,000 and does not exceed $19,000.
Fifteen per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $19,000 and does not exceed $20,000.
Sixteen per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $20,000 and does not exceed $21,000.
Seventeen per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $21,000 and does not exceed $22,000.
Eighteen per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $22,000 and does not exceed $23,000.
Nineteen per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $23,000 and does not exceed $24,000.
Twenty per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $24,000 and does not exceed $25,000.
Twenty-one per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $25,000 and does not exceed $26,000.
Twenty-two per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $26,000 and does not exceed $27,000.
Twenty-three per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $27,000 and does not exceed $28,000.
Twenty-four per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $28,000 and does not exceed $29,000.
Twenty-five per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $29,000 and does not exceed $30,000.
Twenty-six per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $30,000 and does not exceed $32,500.
Twenty-seven per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $32,500 and does not exceed $35,000.
Twenty-eight per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $35,000 and does not exceed $37,500.
Twenty-nine per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $37,500 and does not exceed $40,000.
Thirty per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $40,000 and does not exceed $42,500.
Thirty-one per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $42,500 and does not exceed $45,000.
Thirty-two per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $45,000 and does not exceed $47,500.
Thirty-three per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $47,500 and does not exceed $50,000.
Thirty-four per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $50,000 and does not exceed $60,000.
Thirty-five per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $60,000 and does not exceed $80,000.
Thirty-six per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $80,000 and does not exceed $100,000.
Thirty-seven per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $100,000 and does not exceed $150,000.
Thirty-eight per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $150,000 and does not exceed $200,000.
Thirty-nine per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $200,000 and does not exceed $250,000.
Forty per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $250,000 and does not exceed $300,000.
Forty-one per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $300,000 and does not exceed $500,000.
Forty-two per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $500,000 and does not exceed $750,000.
Forty-five per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $750,000 and does not exceed $1,000,000.
Fifty per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $1,000,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if Senators attended upon the reading of the amendment by the Secretary, they will observe that I offer as a substitute a graduated tax upon incomes based upon graduated steps or additions of $1,000 at 1 per cent additional tax for each additional $1,000 of income. It is worked out upon that principle to the point where the income is in excess of $30,000. From that point to where the income reaches $50,000 1 per cent of tax is added for each $2,500 increase in income. From $50,000 incomes to incomes of over $1,000,000 the steps are graduated the same as in the committee bill as modified by the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY]. As the Senate has accepted the rates of the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island for incomes in excess of $500,000, I thought it best to adjust my amendment to the action of the Senate in that respect. Otherwise, Mr. President, the amendment works out an evenly graduated tax on incomes, raising the rate of 1 per cent for every gradation of additions to the income.

Mr. President, the total amount of revenue estimated to be collected under this proposed amendment I would have been able to state accurately except for the modifications in that amendment made necessary to adjust it to the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island. As I had worked it out up to that point I had computed the exact amount of revenue that would be derived under the rates for each of the brackets and the total amount of revenue derived from all of the brackets, but my computations are thrown somewhat off by the fact that the last three brackets have been so modified by the Senate as to destroy the calculation at that point.

But I can say to Senators, I think, with the utmost confidence, that if you should give your support to the amendment which I have offered you will have a much more consistent, a much more just and fair graduated income tax, than you would if you were to adhere to the committee provisions as modified by the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island. In saying that, I am not pointing my argument especially to large incomes, but I am saying that where the graduated steps in a progressive income tax are wide apart, a somewhat unjust application of the higher rate to an income results at the point of separation, whereas if the gradations are more numerous—a mere thousand dollars apart, for instance—and the percentage of increase at each step is small—1 per cent—then, when you pass from one rate to another, you do not subject the taxpayer who falls in the higher class to such a great and wide difference between his tax and the tax of the class just below him as you do where there is a wide spread between the points at which the different tax rates are applied or a wide spread between the tax rates.

Let me say here something to which I believe the Senate has not had its attention called and which I am inclined to think many Senators may overlook. It is this fact:

When, according to the system of income taxation which we have adopted in this country, you fix a given rate for, say, an income of $10,000, and then a different rate for all of the incomes over $10,000 and not exceeding $12,500, and then a different rate for all of the income over $12,500 and not exceeding $15,000, you are too prone, in looking at the rates fixed in each bracket, to conclude that the entire income up to that point pays the tax rate named in that particular bracket. That is not so. If we applied the flat-rate principle, then the tax rate of a particular bracket would attach to all of the income, but under our system you pay income tax at a lower rate of per cent on that portion of your income which falls within the lower brackets, so that the average amount of your income tax is a very much lower per cent than that fixed in the law.

I have had some computations made to illustrate the workings of our system. I will illustrate by giving to the Senate the amount of money required to pay income taxes at the rates of the bill upon taxable incomes of $10,000, $20,000, $100,000, $500,000, $1,000,000, and $10,000,000, respectively. In doing so I will state the several rates named in the law, the highest combined rate, the amount of money that you would pay under it, then the equivalent flat rate.

First, I will trace it through according to the majority report and then according to the minority report.

Taking the majority plan of taxation, you would pay, upon a $10,000 income, a 2 per cent normal tax under the present law, a 2 per cent normal tax added by the present bill, and a 2 per cent war surtax added by the proposed bill. In other words, if you add together the several rates of per cent you pay a total of 6 per cent tax; but, as a matter of fact, when you have paid at the various stages below $10,000, the rates fixed in the law, instead of paying 6 per cent on a $10,000 income, as a matter of fact you pay 3.55 per cent. That is, you pay the same amount that you would pay if the income tax were a flat tax of 3.55 per cent.

We are likely, from taking the rates named in the bill, to get the idea that the owners of great incomes in this country are going to be assessed a very much higher rate than they are actually assessed upon their incomes. If you can once get fixed in your minds the deductions that must be made for the amounts paid at the lower rates at every bracket and get the equivalent flat tax, then you will see that, as compared with the British income tax, our tax is a very low one indeed.

Take an income of $20,000: Under the majority plan as reported it would pay an existing normal tax of 2 per cent, which with the war normal and war surtax makes a total of 14 per cent.

We are not taxing at that rate. When you have worked out what the recipient of an income of $20,000 will pay upon it after he pays the lower percentages on the lower brackets of his income, instead of coming to 14 per cent he pays what would be the equivalent of a flat rate of 6.2 per cent.

We never have had the slightest approach to an income tax that was fair in this country. We never have had anything like the income tax of Great Britain. It is true, as suggested here on the floor, that Great Britain has levied upon the lower incomes higher taxes than are proposed here; but she has levied higher taxes upon the great mass of the big incomes that fall between, say, $20,000 and $500,000, where the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island begins to attach—and that is where you get the great bulk of big incomes, and it is from those incomes that you will secure a great income-tax return, if that is what is desired.

It is all very well to flourish an amendment of 50 per cent on incomes of $1,000,000 or more. We have not very many of them. There are only a few people to wince under it. Only a limited amount of revenue would be derived from it. But when you come to incomes of $100,000, $200,000, $250,000, $300,000, $350,000, $400,000, and $500,000 you find a vast number of such incomes; and as this bill is being built up here, as reported from the committee, and as changed by the adoption of the high rates inserted in the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island, you are giving the public the impression that you are applying very, very high rates in your income-tax bill. You are doing nothing of the kind. You are applying these rates to a few incomes, and only a few incomes; but the great body of big incomes—so big that they ought to be made to pay their part of supporting this war—have built around them, under the provisions in this bill as reported from the committee, even as modified by the Gerry amendment, a stone wall that protects them against any large payment of income taxes.

Now, Mr. President, go a step further with me in seeing how these rates really work out when you apply them as they will be applied when you come to pay your tax and collect your tax from others.

I gave you the case of a $20,000 income. Take a $60,000 income. A $60,000 income, as proposed in the committee bill, will first take its 2 per cent normal tax under the existing law. Then it will take a 3 per cent surtax under the existing law. Then, when we come to the provisions of this bill, it will have applied to it a second normal tax of 2 per cent. It will then have applied to it what you would call a war surtax, a temporary surtax of 12 per cent, like the temporary additional normal tax, that is to last as long as the war. The total of this is 19 per cent, and it may be said that you are assessing incomes of $60,000 19 per cent. You are doing nothing of the kind. Here is what you are doing: You are assessing them the equivalent of a flat rate of 11.1 per cent.

I wonder if I succeed, in this maze and intricate recital of percentages, in making myself clearly understood by the Senate? If I do, I am sure you will vote to adopt an amendment commensurate with the needs of the country, an amendment that lays no burdens upon these incomes that they ought not to volunteer to pay, let alone wait to be compelled by law to pay.

As you get to the higher incomes, then the combined rates of the different steps or gradations more nearly approach the combined highest rate named in the bill. For instance, take an income of $1,000,000. An income of $1,000,000 in the bill here, as I remember, is assessed 48 per cent. Now, then, in the bill as reported and under consideration the tax which such an income would pay would be the 2 per cent rate of the existing law, the 11 per cent surtax of the existing law, and then a 2 per cent war normal proposed in this bill, and then added to that a 33 per cent surtax, aggregating all told 48 per cent.

Now, you would expect, of course—and I think perhaps Senators have been bearing the computation in their minds—that incomes of a million dollars pay 48 per cent. They pay nothing of the kind. When they have paid what each bracket calls upon them to pay, you get as a total amount that they contribute out of their incomes, the equivalent of a flat rate of 40$\frac{2}{10}$ per cent instead of 48 per cent. But, as I said, as you reach the higher grades the differences are not so great.

Mr. President, I have tried to make that as clear as I could to the Senate in the hope that Senators here are going to consider not the misleading figures that are quoted, not intentionally quoted for the purpose of misleading, but not explained as they ought to be; that they are not going to assume from those statements or the recitals of the bill that you are to assess these incomes at the high rate applicable to the brackets in which the incomes fall.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I would prefer to have the Senator interrupt me when I am through, but if it would please any of the Senators here to have me yield now I will yield now. I am quite willing to yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to say to the Senator——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I know in that report you have figured out some statement of it.

Mr. SMOOT. I wanted the Senator to know and he does know that the committee has not tried to misrepresent——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, no; and I said just before the Senator interrupted me that there was no intention to mislead.

Mr. SMOOT. Because on page 23 of the report the figures that have been quoted now by the Senator are set out plainly, showing exactly what each bracket pays under the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I had not intended to say anything here to make any member of the majority wince. I had said expressly in a sentence or two preceding that there had been no intention to mislead. It has been assumed, and I suppose the majority had the right to assume, that every Senator would study those brackets and work out for himself the facts; that he ought to know before he votes on these rates that the rates named in the bill are not the rates the whole income within each bracket will have to pay. Yet I undertake to say that probably not a half dozen Senators on this floor have either seen that table or worked out the fact that I am trying in my imperfect way to lay before you, and I think it ought to be laid before you because it is a fact that ought to bear with weight upon your votes.

Whatever we may do here in the swift hours that speed legislation under the pressure of our great emergency we should remember that by the fireside and in the study the people of this country are going to take more time than we working out in all its details and applying the legislation that we are enacting.

So, Mr. President, I felt warranted in taking a little time to lay before the Senate what seemed to me to be an important fact for Senators to consider before voting upon the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. THOMPSON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? Does the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island increase or decrease the computation of the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It increases it, because it raises the last two brackets; but it makes different brackets.

Mr. THOMPSON. The estimate of the Senator from Wisconsin will be a little less than the real amount?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It will be less than the amount that will be raised by the changes that have been made by adopting the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Now, if the Senate please, the total estimated to be collected as an additional war-income tax under my pending amendment would amount to $723,616,848. The amount of additional income under the committee's proposed bill aggregates $417,763,083. These estimates do not include the corporation tax. I am now just dealing with individual incomes. My amendment does not touch on the incomes of corporations. We have no business to have swelled the total amount to be gathered by an income tax to over a billion dollars by adding the corporation tax when we are just considering individual incomes.

You have been told here that the income tax to be collected under the Gerry amendment would be $1,000,100,000 or more. That is not the tax collected on incomes of individuals. They have added to the amount to be collected on individual incomes the added taxes of $360,000,000 to be collected from corporations. The Senate is considering this afternoon the tax upon individual incomes. In the first line of the amendment there is, I believe, a 2 per cent additional tax upon corporations.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will state to the Senator my understanding is that the amount collected in addition is $490,000,000.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have the tables figured out by Mr. McCoy here which do not give that result.

Mr. SIMMONS. That includes the amendment submitted by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That includes the amount made by the Senator from Rhode Island. I stand corrected on that.

Mr. SIMMONS. Both the Gerry and the Lenroot amendments.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand that, but as the bill was reported the additions made to the tax that would be paid by individuals is $417,763,083. If the amendment which I have just offered is adopted raising by a graduated income tax, graduated at the stages of $1,000 and $2,500, until the largest incomes are reached, it would raise a total of $723,616,848, as against $417,763,083 in the bill as reported by the committee. That is the total tax on incomes for the period of the war.

Now, if you want the total tax that the majority would collect under their bill as compared with the totals that they would collect under the provisions of the amendment I have offered, these are: Under the bill as reported by the committee the total income tax would be $523,244,750, as against a total income tax, if you will accept the graduations I make and the percentage that I have offered in this amendment, of $806,512,463.

Mr. President, I will ask permission to print in connection with my remarks the tables which I have used which apply to this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

[1] The brackets $7,000 to $8,000 and $12,000 to $13,000 of the proposed amendment in this table are divided on $7,500 and $12,500, respectively, to show where the brackets break in the committee bill and to make accurate comparison.

Mr. LODGE. May I ask the Senator to state about what those averages would be under his proposed amendment? I ask just for the purpose of comparison.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have not that worked out, I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts, for the amendment which I am now speaking to. I have two other amendments. The table from which I have given these computations was prepared a couple of days before I got to the amendment which I offered to-day. When I come to the other amendment, if this amendment should not be accepted by the Senate, I will then be able to give the Senator those computations. I am having them worked out now, and I may be able to put them into the RECORD, not only for these incomes but for all the incomes and all the grades. I will ask leave now to incorporate, if I can complete it in time for the RECORD to-night, the table of figures which will show the actual amount paid on every income under the amendment which I have offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. May I ask the Senator a question? I have not yet been able to understand how much the figures which he has given as the result of the House bill with reference to section 2 and the Gerry amendment will yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I give the figures that the committee report. I, of course, worked out my tables under the amendment as the bill was reported and it does not include the additions that have been made by the adoption of the Lenroot and the Gerry amendments.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then the Senator is not able to give the total?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I can not; but I will say that I am confident it will raise somewhat more money and will certainly raise it in a much more scientific way, because the steps at which the rates change are shorter while it advances by stages which makes it more just to the payer of incomes, far more just.

Mr. President, I think that is all I care to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, since the Senator has been speaking I have analyzed his amendment, and I want to call the attention of the Senate now to what the amendment really proposes and the rate of taxation upon each bracket that, if adopted, would apply to incomes hereafter.

The first bracket that is under the La Follette amendment imposes an additional tax of 1 per cent. The bill as reported by the Senate committee proposes the same tax of 1 per cent. The present law is 2 per cent, making the tax upon an income exceeding $5,000 and not exceeding $6,000 3 per cent.

The next is the 2 per cent bracket, under the La Follette amendment and under the amendment of the Senate committee it is 1 per cent, making 3 per cent under the Senate committee and 4 per cent under the La Follette amendment on incomes exceeding $6,000 and not exceeding $7,000.

On net incomes exceeding $7,000 and not exceeding $8,000 under the La Follette amendment there will be a tax of 7 per cent. Under the Senate committee amendment there will be a tax of 6 per cent. On incomes exceeding $8,000 and not exceeding $9,000 under the La Follette amendment there will be a tax of 11 per cent.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; the Senator is mistaken. The tax is 8 per cent, if he will permit me to correct him.

Mr. SMOOT. Excuse me, I took the wrong bracket.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is right. I took the bracket below. I wish the Senator would follow the figures closely that I may not misstate them, because I figured them out while the Senator was speaking.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have a table which I will put in the RECORD, which will show the figures accurately.

Mr. SMOOT. I think I can give the Senate the information now.

On incomes exceeding $6,000 and not exceeding $9,000 the tax under the La Follette amendment is 8 per cent. Under the Senate committee provision it is 6 per cent.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question there?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator is mistaken again in saying $6,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To whom does the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator from Utah asked me to correct him if he made a mistake.

Mr. SMOOT. That is right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska addressed the Chair.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I took it from that that he yielded to me. I will now address the Chair and if the Senator from Utah desires to have me correct him, I should like to be considered not out of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Utah to the fact that the Senator from Nebraska requested the privilege of interrupting him. That was the remark of the Chair. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The only thing I want to do is to call the attention of the Senator to what I believe was an error in his statement. That has already been corrected by the Senator from Wisconsin, as I understand it, although I did not understand what the Senator from Wisconsin said. The error was in going from $6,000 to $9,000.

Mr. SMOOT. It should have been from $8,000 to $9,000. On incomes exceeding $9,000 and not exceeding $10,000, under the La Follette amendment the tax would be 9 per cent; under the Senate committee amendment it is 6 per cent.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, of course, it does not mean that there will be a flat tax of 10 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. No. When I get through with all of these percentages I shall then explain just exactly what the Senator from Wisconsin has already explained and shall also explain precisely the way in which England and France and Germany and all countries which have a graduated tax impose the tax and estimate the amount of taxes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator from Nebraska will allow me to proceed with this, I shall later answer the question.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to make a suggestion. I do it without any spirit of contention; I only do it as a matter of fairness. Of course I know the Senator was not trying to mislead anyone, but yet if the language is taken just as he gives it it would create an impression which I know the Senator from Utah does not wish to create. The Senator said the tax would be 9 per cent, but the tax would be 8 per cent. As I understand, he does not mean the tax would be that much, but he means that it would go as high as that on a part of the income.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly what the Senator from Utah means; that on this bracket, and only so far as this bracket is concerned, the rate is 9 per cent.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is, on $1,000 it would be 9 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. This is the bracket covering incomes between $9,000 and $10,000.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The rate is 9 per cent on the difference between $9,000 and $10,000. It would be 9 per cent on $1,000 and no more.

Mr. SMOOT. The income below the amount specified is assessed according to other rates imposed in each bracket. All income taxes are written in the same way. For instance, the Senator provides in this bracket:

Five per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $9,000 and does not exceed $10,000.

It is not 5 per cent upon the $10,000 but 5 per cent upon whatever there is over and above the minimum named in the bracket in addition to the taxes imposed in preceding brackets. The Senator understands it, and I thought that every Senator understood it. So I will say to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] that when I say the rate will be 10 per cent under the La Follette amendment, I mean as to that particular bracket, over and above the lower sum named and not exceeding the higher sum.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. Am I right in assuming that the maximum tax will be upon the last thousand dollars and that it will be 1 per cent less for each $1,000 below that?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. It will be exactly 1 per cent if the brackets increase only $1,000.

Mr. GRONNA. But it will be less?

Mr. SMOOT. It may be less.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is 1 per cent on these brackets. The Senator is right.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, Mr. President, there is no question but that the system followed in the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin and the system followed in the bill as reported to the Senate are exactly the same; and it is the same system adopted in England, in Germany, in France, and in every other country which does not have a flat rate of taxation.

Mr. GRONNA. I simply desire to know from the Senator from Utah if I am right in understanding that the maximum tax is simply upon the last $1,000. Is that correct?

Mr. SMOOT. It is, wherever the lower amount named in the bracket increases but $1,000. If the amount of increase is $1,000, the La Follette amendment provides for an increase over the preceding bracket of 1 per cent on the increase. If the increase is $20,000 it is 1 per cent upon $20,000, and if it is $50,000 the increase is 1 per cent upon $50,000.

Mr. GRONNA. But in the last bracket named by the Senator it would not be 9 per cent upon the whole amount. It is, however, very easily misunderstood by a person reading the RECORD unless that is explained.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I thought all the Senators understood that.

Mr. GRONNA. But there are others who read the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, on incomes exceeding $10,000 and not exceeding $11,000, under the La Follette amendment the tax is 10 per cent, and under the Senate committee amendment it is 7 per cent. On incomes exceeding $11,000 and not exceeding $12,000 the tax under the La Follette amendment is 11 per cent, and under the Senate bill it is 7 per cent.

On incomes exceeding $12,000 and not exceeding $13,000, under the La Follette amendment the tax is 12 per cent, and under the Senate amendment it is 8 per cent.

On incomes exceeding $13,000 and not exceeding $14,000, under the La Follette amendment the tax is 13 per cent, and under the Senate amendment it is 8 per cent.

On incomes exceeding $14,000 and not exceeding $15,000, under the La Follette amendment the tax is 14 per cent, and under the Senate amendment it is 8 per cent.

On incomes exceeding $15,000 and not exceeding $16,000, under the La Follette amendment the tax is 15 per cent, and under the Senate committee amendment it is 10 per cent.

On incomes exceeding $16,000 and not exceeding $17,000, under the La Follette amendment the tax is 16 per cent, and under the Senate amendment it is 10 per cent.

On incomes exceeding $17,000 and not exceeding $18,000, under the La Follette amendment the tax is 17 per cent, and under the Senate amendment it is 10 per cent.

On incomes exceeding $18,000 and not exceeding $19,000, under the La Follette amendment the tax is 18 per cent, and under the Senate amendment it is 10 per cent.

On incomes exceeding $19,000 and not exceeding $20,000, under the La Follette amendment the tax is 19 per cent, and under the Senate amendment it is 10 per cent.

On incomes exceeding $20,000 and not exceeding $21,000, under the La Follette amendment the tax is 21 per cent, and under the Senate amendment it is 13 per cent.

On incomes exceeding $21,000 and not exceeding $22,000, under the La Follette amendment the tax is 22 per cent, and under the Senate amendment it is 13 per cent.

On incomes exceeding $22,000 and not exceeding $23,000, under the La Follette amendment the tax is 23 per cent, and under the Senate amendment it is 13 per cent.

On incomes exceeding $23,000 and not exceeding $24,000, under the La Follette amendment the tax is 24 per cent, and under the Senate amendment it is 13 per cent.

On incomes exceeding $24,000 and not exceeding $25,000, under the La Follette amendment the tax is 25 per cent, and under the Senate amendment it is 13 per cent.

On incomes exceeding $25,000 and not exceeding $26,000, under the La Follette amendment the tax is 26 per cent, and under the Senate amendment it is 13 per cent, or just one-half.

On incomes exceeding $26,000 and not exceeding $27,000, under the La Follette amendment the tax is 27 per cent, and under the Senate amendment it is 13 per cent.

On incomes exceeding $27,000 and not exceeding $28,000, under the La Follette amendment the tax is 28 per cent, and under the Senate amendment it is 13 per cent.

On incomes exceeding $28,000 and not exceeding $29,000, under the La Follette amendment the tax is 29 per cent, and under the Senate amendment it is 13 per cent.

On incomes exceeding $29,000 and not exceeding $30,000, under the La Follette amendment a tax is imposed of 30 per cent, while under the Senate amendment it is 13 per cent.

On incomes exceeding $30,000 and not exceeding $32,500, under the La Follette amendment the tax is 31 per cent, and under the Senate amendment it is 13 per cent.

On incomes exceeding $32,500 and not exceeding $35,000, under the La Follette amendment the tax is 32 per cent, and under the Senate amendment it is 13 per cent.

On incomes exceeding $35,000 and not exceeding $37,500, under the La Follette amendment the tax is 33 per cent, and under the Senate amendment it is 13 per cent.

On incomes exceeding $37,500 and not exceeding $40,000, under the La Follette amendment the tax is 34 per cent, and under the Senate amendment it is 13 per cent.

On incomes exceeding $40,000 and not exceeding $42,500, under the La Follette amendment the tax is 37 per cent——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is 36 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. And under the bill as reported to the Senate by the committee it is 17 per cent.

On incomes exceeding $42,500 and not exceeding $45,000, under the La Follette amendment the tax is 38 per cent, and under the Senate amendment it is 17 per cent.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Under my amendment it is 37 per cent, if the Senator would like to make the correction.

Mr. SMOOT. On incomes exceeding $45,000 and not exceeding $47,500, the tax under the La Follette amendment is 39 per cent, and under the Senate amendment it is 17 per cent.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Under my proposed amendment it is 38 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. On incomes exceeding $47,500 and not exceeding $50,000, under the La Follette amendment the tax is 40 per cent, and under the Senate amendment it is 17 per cent.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. According to my computation, the rate under my amendment is 39 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. On incomes exceeding $50,000 and not exceeding $60,000, under the La Follette amendment the tax is 41 per cent, while under the Senate amendment it is 17 per cent.

On incomes exceeding $60,000 and not exceeding $80,000, under the La Follette amendment the tax is 43 per cent, while under the Senate amendment it is 25.75 per cent. That is based on the amendment to that bracket agreed to to-day.

On incomes exceeding $80,000 and not exceeding $100,000, under the La Follette amendment the tax is 45 per cent, while under the Senate amendment it is 26.5 per cent.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, does the Senator care to have me make the corrections which I think should be made in the figures he has given, or does he prefer not to be interrupted? I do not wish to interrupt the Senator if he prefers not to be interrupted.

Mr. SMOOT. If there is anything wrong in the figures I have given, I should like to be corrected now.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. According to the computations that have been made by me, there have been four or five figures given in succession by the Senator that are inaccurate; but I do not care to break in on the Senator's remarks.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator's figures in those cases are perhaps 1 per cent less.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. They have been made——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The colloquy between the Senators may be very interesting, but, under the rules of the Senate, other Senators are entitled to hear it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I thought the Senator from Utah had yielded to me some time ago to make corrections as he made his statement; otherwise I would not have remained on the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. On net incomes exceeding $100,000 and not exceeding $150,000, under the La Follette amendment the tax is 47 per cent, while under the bill as reported to the Senate, with the amendment adopted to-day, it is 21.25 per cent.

On incomes exceeding $150,000 and not exceeding $200,000, under the La Follette amendment the tax is 50 per cent, while under the Senate amendment it is 37 per cent.

On incomes exceeding $200,000 and not exceeding $250,000, under the La Follette amendment the tax is 53 per cent, while under the Senate amendment it is 44 per cent.

On incomes exceeding $250,000 and not exceeding $350,000, under the La Follette amendment the tax is 56 per cent, while under the Senate amendment it is 49.75 per cent.

On incomes exceeding $300,000 and not exceeding $500,000 under the La Follette amendment the tax is 59 per cent, while under the Senate amendment it is 55.5 per cent.

On incomes exceeding $500,000 and not exceeding $1,000,000 under the La Follette amendment the rate is 65 per cent, while under the Senate committee amendment as amended it is 65 per cent, the rate being exactly the same.

I understand that the Senator from Wisconsin in his amendment—I have not a copy of it—has made the other brackets conform to the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island, and therefore the remaining rates are exactly the same.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. May I ask the Senator if the figures he has given are based upon the Senate bill as amended a little while ago, adopting the House rates in certain brackets?

Mr. SMOOT. I give the figures for the brackets as they have been amended in accordance with what is known as the Lenroot amendment. I have included those increases in the figures I have given.

Now, I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the great increases which will be provided by the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin will come on incomes beginning with $12,000 up to and including $40,000. For instance, I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that it is a graduated tax by steps of $1,000. Beginning with incomes exceeding $11,000 and not exceeding $12,000, there is only a difference between the Senate bill and the La Follette amendment of 4 per cent; but when we reach the bracket covering net incomes exceeding $35,500 and not exceeding $40,000 there is a difference of 21 per cent. On incomes between $11,000 and $37,500 is where the great bulk of the increase will fall. That is the substance of the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The Senator stated that the tax percentages are entirely different from the income tax imposed in England; that when we impose a tax in a certain bracket of 34 per cent it does not mean 34 per cent upon the full net income of $37,500. That is true, because beginning with the lowest bracket the amount of income upon which the tax is imposed is that above the lowest amount named in that bracket. So with the second bracket, the third bracket, the fourth bracket, down to and including the last bracket in the bill. Mr. President, that is exactly the same system as is provided under the British law.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate now to the rate of taxation and the exemptions under the British law and under the French and under the German law, to see to what length of taxation on incomes we are going as compared with the imposition of income taxes by those countries which have been in war for three years.

I will take the English law of 1917, passed this year. We all know that the increases were considerable; in fact, the English papers in discussing them thought that they were exorbitantly high. Now, I want the Senate to follow me while I discuss the taxes England imposes upon incomes of citizens of that country.

First, I want to call attention to the exemptions.

On incomes exceeding $650 and not exceeding $2,000 there is an exemption of $650.

On incomes exceeding $2,000 and not exceeding $3,000 there is an exemption of $500.

On incomes exceeding $3,000 and not exceeding $3,500 there is an exemption of $350.

On incomes exceeding $3,500 there is no exemption at all.

I have taken pounds sterling and converted them into dollars all the way through, so that Senators will not have to convert pounds into dollars while I am calling attention to the rates.

Now, the rate of taxation, first, on unearned incomes: England has one tax for unearned incomes and a different tax on earned incomes, and I will call attention to the difference. I will take first unearned incomes.

Not exceeding $1,500, 15 per cent.
Exceeding $1,500 and not exceeding $2,500, 15 per cent.
Exceeding $2,500 and not exceeding $5,000, 17½ per cent.
Exceeding $5,000 and not exceeding $7,500, 20 per cent.
Exceeding $7,500 and not exceeding $10,000, 22½ per cent.
Exceeding $10,000, 25 per cent.

Now, on the earned incomes.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator explain what is meant by "unearned incomes"?

Mr. SMOOT. Incomes coming from interest on bonds, interest on notes, and dividends from corporations—an income the individual did not earn himself. It was earned by somebody else or in some other way.

Now, as to earned incomes:

Not exceeding $2,500, 11¼ per cent.
Exceeding $2,500 and not exceeding $5,000, 12½ per cent.
Exceeding $5,000 and not exceeding $7,500, 15 per cent
Exceeding $7,500 and not exceeding $10,000. 18¾ per cent.
Exceeding $10,000 and not exceeding $12,500, 21⅜ per cent.
Exceeding $12,500, 25 per cent.

In the law of 1917 they have imposed a surtax on incomes, and the following are the rates:

There is no surtax below $12,500.
Exceeding $12,500 and not exceeding $15,000, 2½ per cent.
On incomes of $15,000 and not exceeding $20,000. 5⅝ per cent.
On incomes of $20,000 and not exceeding $25,000, 7½ per cent.
On incomes of $25,000 and not exceeding $30,000, 9⅜ per cent.
On incomes of $30,000 and not exceeding $35,000, 10⅝ per cent.
On incomes of $35,000 and not exceeding $40,000, 12½ per cent.
On incomes of $40,000 and not exceeding $45,000, 14⅜ per cent.
On incomes of $45,000 and not exceeding $50,000, 15⅝ per cent.
On incomes of $50,000 and all above, 17½ per cent.

Mr. President, you can take the highest rate imposed upon earned incomes or unearned incomes, and add the highest rate and the supertax on incomes imposed by Great Britain, and the total is 42½ per cent. I want the Senate to understand that that 42½ per cent means exactly what the 42½ per cent would mean upon any bracket of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin or by the committee itself. The only difference is in the number of steps that may be taken or the brackets that are found in the two laws.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, will the Senator tell us what lesson we are to draw from that comparison?

Mr. SMOOT. I understood the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to say that if we would figure the rates of the British income tax on the basis that the majority members of the committee reported to the Senate in their report, the rates provided in the Senate amendment would not be so high as the income tax rates imposed by Great Britain.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if it will not annoy the Senator, I should like to ask whether, under that scheme of taxation, Britain is able to get along in the present situation; whether she is able to pay her expenses; whether she has not had a good friend somewhere near that could make up the difference between what she is collecting under her scheme of taxation and what she is obliged to expend?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no question but that England is borrowing money from this country; but I want to say to the Senator that England has not borrowed nearly the amount of money from America that she has loaned to her allies.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; but where will America borrow her money? In what country will America be able to borrow money if her scheme of taxation is insufficient?

Mr. SMOOT. Why, Mr. President, America is going to borrow the money from Americans, and no one else in the world, because there is no other power on earth that has money to loan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly. This is the only place to which we can go, and the only market for our securities. Now, if we take chances of not being able to sustain ourselves in a crisis like this through loans, we must resort to taxation; and the thing that has impressed me very seriously during this entire discussion has been whether we should wait, in our resort to taxation, until these vast profits have been distributed or whether we should get them now or such proportion of them as the country feels it should have.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator, I think the proper way to do is to raise the necessary expenses of the Government from both sources—by the issuing of bonds and by the imposition of taxes. When we come to the question of war profits I shall call attention—and I think it has already been called to the attention of the Senate by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]—to the fact that the amount of taxes we are collecting to-day, or propose to collect for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, is a greater percentage of the appropriations made for the fiscal year than has been collected by any other Government involved in the present war.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, will it annoy the Senator if I interrupt him again?

Mr. SMOOT. Not in the least, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There are only two sources of revenue for the Government. One is taxation and the other is pledging its credit. If our credit is pledged and not accepted, or if the bonds of the Government depreciate in the open market, that is calculated to weaken the credit of the Government and seriously impair its internal and domestic affairs, extending down to the humblest borrower. The taxation method, however, is only calculated to embarrass temporarily those who are amply able to meet it. Now, I think there ought to be somewhere a happy medium, which would not jeopardize the credit of the country, between those two extremes. I am not altogether clear that the suggestions of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] solve the matter appropriately. I notice, by running through the figures, that the amendment proposed and adopted at the suggestion of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] gives us an additional income of $46,225,000 That was a wholesome amendment and was adopted unanimously. By restoring the Lenroot brackets in the House bill, which the Senate has done with practical unanimity, no roll call being ordered on many of those provisions, $26,175,000 will be yielded to the Government. Now, that is certainly helpful legislation in this crisis, is it not? Does the Senator take issue with that statement?

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all. I voted for the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Exactly. That is a helpful thing. But can we not, without any great injustice, obtain more of the ready profits not yet distributed and avoid by just so much the necessity of going on the open market with our bonds and the possibility of their falling below par, and the possibility that they will not be absorbed by the people of the country?

I should like to hear what the Senator has to say about that, for I have great confidence in him, and I know how absolutely disinterested and patriotic he is, and how thorough he is. I have great confidence in him, and I should like it very much if he would give us his views without reserve upon that point.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that I do not think he need have any apprehension that a 3½ per cent Government bond bearing no taxation whatever is ever going to go begging on the American market.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Why, it is below par to-day. It has been below par in the last day or two.

Mr. SMOOT. I am sure the Senator is mistaken. When we take into consideration the taxes that are going to be imposed, no matter what bill passes the Congress, at this session, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that if you take the income-tax rates adopted recently by the House bill and add to the 3½ per cent interest on the liberty loan such percentage as you would have to pay on taxable securities, you would get some astonishing results. Let me call the Senator's attention to some of them.

For instance, if an individual had an income of $100,000 per annum, and was taxed under the rates that will be imposed, no matter what bill passes, even if the House rates prevail without the additions made to the House bill by the Senate, he could just as well afford to invest in liberty bonds at 3½ per cent as he could afford to buy a gilt-edged mortgage note bearing a rate of interest of 5.2 per cent. If his income was $150,000, it would be equal to 5.38 per cent. If it was $200,000, it would be equal to 5.93 per cent.

Mr. LODGE. That is, if the bonds are not taxable.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I said. I made that statement in my opening remarks.

On an income of $250,000, it would be equal to 6.45 per cent.
On $300,000, it would be equal to 7.7 per cent.
On $500,000, it would be equal to 7.82 per cent.
On $1,000,000, it would be equal to 8.75 per cent.
On $1,500,000, it would be equal to 8.97 per cent.
On an income of $2,000,000, it would be equal to 9.20 per cent.

And as the incomes increase, Mr. President, so would the advantage increase in purchasing Government bonds.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. Does not the Senator think, if he carries out that analysis, that if we should have a lot more bonds like those it would get us into a very unhealthy financial condition, without any money to tax? Would we not have to tax all the absolute necessaries of life, and have a tax on consumption instead of on the wealth of the country?

Mr. SMOOT. Whatever rate of interest may be carried by the bonds that are issued, if it is a low rate of interest, it falls that much lighter upon the consumers of the country and the people generally. That, the Senator must admit.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but every dollar that is invested in these bonds is taken out of taxation, and we can not tax it. If the Senator has some more bonds like those issued, and makes them so inviting that it results in practically an income of 9 per cent, will not the result be that all the property of the country will be invested in those bonds, and we will have nothing left to tax except necessaries?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator, as he refers to bonds already issued, that being nontaxable did not meet my full approval. I do not believe there will be another Government bond issue during this war that will be exempt from taxation. Not only that, but I say now that in my opinion all the bonds that have already been issued exempt from taxation will be redeemed before there is another bond issue; and when that bond issue comes I have no doubt but that there will be Federal taxes imposed upon it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will not these bonds carry a higher rate of interest, then, if they issue any others?

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, they can afford to carry a higher rate when they are taxed under the revenue bill that we are going to pass, either at this session of Congress or at any other session of Congress; but the rate that will be imposed under this bill will be the very lowest rate that will maintain during this war.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The suggestion is made by the Senator from Nebraska that the money invested in the purchase of bonds would escape taxation. Does not the proceeds of the sale of the bonds go right back? Is it not spent by the Government, and put right back into the business of the country, where it is subject to taxation?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly, I took it for granted that the Senator was referring only to the ultimate payment of the bonds, and that would have to come from taxation imposed on the people.

Now, Mr. President, what do we find in France? France has stood a great part of the brunt of this world war. She has drawn from every source that she thinks it is possible to draw from and yet maintain her productivity and activity in business, in order to secure sufficient money to meet her war expenses. She, too, resorted to an income tax, and it is interesting to know at what rates. Senators, I call your attention to them now, because it is generally understood that France is nearly at the end of her resources and must be assisted by the United States in order to continue her effective work in the defeat of Germany. Yet in the latter part of 1916, when she passed her income-tax law, she imposed only the following taxes:

On incomes between $600 and $1,600, 1 per cent.
Sixteen hundred dollars to $2,400, 2 per cent.
Twenty-four hundred dollars to $3.200, 3 per cent.
Thirty-two hundred dollars to $4,000, 4 per cent.
Four thousand dollars to $8,000, 5 per cent.
Eight thousand dollars to $12,000, 6 per cent.
Twelve thousand dollars to $16,000, 7 per cent.
Sixteen thousand dollars to $20,000, 8 per cent.
Twenty thousand dollars to $30,000, 9 per cent.

All over $30,000, 10 per cent. There is no tax imposed that amounts to 10 per cent on incomes in France, as her rates are under the bracket system. Then what are her deductions? On one dependent 5 per cent; on two dependents 10 per cent; on three dependents 20 per cent, and each additional dependent 10 per cent, until the deductions shall reach not to exceed 50 per cent.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. When was that?

Mr. SMOOT. The latter part of 1916. I have not the exact date. Now there are further exemptions in France: A married person, $400; a dependent person, $200; up to five dependents, each dependent person, $200; each after the five, or, in other words, if there are six dependents, five of them will be at $200 and one at $300, and if there are seven, two will be at $300, and if eight, three at $300. That is what France thinks is the very limit that she can go and maintain her business in the most productive manner possible.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is she maintaining it?

Mr. SMOOT. I think that she is. France has borrowed money, and every other country with the exception of Japan and America, has borrowed money on account of the war, and they will have to borrow more money, and the United States will have to do the same thing. When this war is over, I frankly admit, and I have said so upon the floor of the Senate, that if it continues a year from now our bonded indebtedness will be even greater than that of Great Britain.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. WEEKS. I understand the Senator from Utah mentioned that the total taxes to be raised in France from the beginning of the war average 14½ per cent of the total expenses of that country in the war.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that some one asked me that question. I told him when the war-profits title is under discussion I intended to show the percentage of taxes collected by every Government involved in this war as compared with the amount of bonded indebtedness, both covering the expenses caused by the war.

Mr. President, we must know that Germany will impose all taxes possible to meet her present conditions. I can not take the time of the Senate to read all the brackets that are in the German income-tax law. I have not even counted them, but I will say offhand that there are over a hundred brackets in the German income-tax law. It begins with incomes of $250 and the tax is sixty-six one-hundredths of 1 per cent. It increases up to and including 3.15 per cent on incomes over and above $2,261, and then it proceeds, as I stated, in a great many brackets. I am not going to take the time of the Senate, as it is now after 5 o'clock, to name the rate of tax imposed upon each bracket.

Mr. STERLING. Will the Senator give an illustration of the income tax, say, taking incomes of $10,000?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say in the German income tax there is a certain rate imposed upon individuals, and there are other and different rates imposed upon limited liability companies and upon unlimited companies; that is, there are two kinds of companies incorporated under different laws in Germany, and they are taxed at a different rate of taxation.

In other words, the highest rate on the individual is 25 per cent; the highest rate on a limited liability company is 40 per cent, and the highest rate on an unlimited company is 50 per cent. The rate on individuals increases from sixty-six one-hundredths of 1 per cent to 25 per cent, the maximum on limited liability companies 40 per cent, and unlimited liability companies 50 per cent.

Mr. STERLING. That is on an income of $10,000?

Mr. SMOOT. It is graduated. No matter what the income may be, that is the lowest and the highest, and they are graduated from $214 in Germany to an unlimited amount.

Mr. STERLING. I wondered if the Senator could give the rate of taxation against an individual income of about $10,000, approximately.

Mr. SMOOT. I will state just what they are up to that amount. On incomes of the individual exceeding $285 and not exceeding $714, 5 per cent. Exceeding $714 and not exceeding $2,499, 10 per cent.

Exceeding $2,499 and not exceeding $4,879, 15 per cent.

Exceeding $4,879 and not exceeding $7,140, 20 per cent, and all over and above $7,140, 25 per cent.

Now, take Canada. There is no income tax in Canada. Canada is in this war and borrowing money to pay the expenses of the war. Canada thinks it unwise to impose an income tax. She is conscripting her citizens and they are offering their lives.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is a good protective tariff.

Mr. SMOOT. If I had had my way, I will say to the Senator, we would have provided in this bill for the collection of $200,000,000 from the increase in tariff rates.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If I had my way, I would vote the same way as the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. But I am not going into a discussion of that now.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is a disagreeable one.

Mr. SMOOT. It is not a disagreeable one to me. I will say to the Senator I have no apology to offer for a protective-tariff system, and before the debate closes I am going to show just how I feel in relation to the same. I want to tell the Senator and the Senate if there ever was a time in the history of America, now is the time to provide for a protective-tariff law, so that when the war ceases and normal conditions are again established in all the world, when the competition will be the keenest that was ever known in the history of the world, when the reconstruction period begins, the readjustment of wages in this country takes place—I say that every American citizen will wish from the bottom of his heart, and particularly every laboring man in this country, that we had provided a protective tariff that would at least protect them against the unknown and severe competition that is going to take place in the different countries of the world when the war ceases.

The people, Mr. President, who are now fighting in the trenches must have employment when the war ends; they must live, they must procure enough to eat and wear, and in order to do that they have got to find employment, and when they are employed goods must be made for exportation; and where is the best market in all the world? Where is the only market, I may say? America. We may think we have had competition in the past, but I want to say to Senators now it will only be a fleabite compared with what we are yet to have.

Mr. President, I do not care to say anything more upon this question to-night; it is getting late and I am a little tired. I will ask the chairman of the committee if he will take an adjournment or a recess at this time.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will make a motion for a recess after the Senator from Wisconsin has made a statement.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not know that the Senator from Wisconsin wished to make a statement.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I did not wish to delay the Senate, but the chairman of the committee has consented that I might take two or three minutes to just put into the RECORD for the consideration of Senators a comparison between the British rate and the rate in the proposed amendment. The Senator from Utah, after stating the rates and the proposed amendment in comparison with the very low rates in the committee's reported bill, passed to the presentation of other matters and finally came to quote from the British income-tax law its rate, but it was so removed from the statement of rates as quoted from his figuring on the amendment which I propose that I wish to bring them together and state them in juxtaposition.

Upon incomes of $1,000 and not in excess of $3,000 the rate in the proposed amendment is 2 per cent; the British rate is 11¼ per cent.

On the next bracket—and I will put it in that way to shorten the statement—the proposed amendment is 2 per cent and the British rate 12½. On the next bracket 5 per cent, and the British rate 15 per cent.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What bracket did you start with?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I started with $1,000. If you would like to have the rate on $5,000, not exceeding $6,000, the rate under the proposed amendment is 5 per cent, the British rate is 15 per cent.

On $6,000 to $7,000, my rate—if I may speak of it in that way to make it short—is 6 per cent, the British rate, 15 per cent.

From $7,000 to $7,500, 7 per cent, as against the British rate of 15 per cent.

From $7,500 to $8,000, 7 per cent, as against the British rate of 18¾ per cent.

On $8,000 to $9,000, 8 per cent is the proposed amendment. The British rate is 18¾ per cent.

On $9,000 to $10,000, I propose a rate of 9 per cent. The British rate is 21⅞ per cent.

On $10,000 to $11,000, the rate which I propose is 10 per cent. The British rate is 21⅞ per cent.

On $11,000 to $12,000, the rate which I propose is 11 per cent. The British rate is 21⅞ per cent.

On $12,000 to $12,500, the rate which I propose is 12 per cent. The British rate is 21⅞ per cent.

On $12,500 to $13,000, I propose 12 per cent. The British rate is 29 per cent.

On $13,000 to $14,000, I propose 13 per cent. The British rate is 29 per cent.

On $14,000 to $15,000, I propose 14 per cent. The British rate is 30⅝ per cent.

On $15,000 to $16,000, I propose 15 per cent. The British rate is 30⅝ per cent.

On $16,000 to $17,000, I propose 16 per cent, and the British rate is 30⅝ per cent.

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator will excuse me, by the 12 per cent referred to in the Senator's amendment, it means 12 per cent additional tax?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. STERLING. Taking the normal tax and the surtax, it would amount to more than 12 per cent, of course. It would probably be 16 per cent.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The 12 per cent additional includes all the other rates excepting the rates of the existing law, and it includes the war normal and the surtax.

Mr. STERLING. While the rate quoted as the British rate is the total.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is the total, and when you have added that rate you will only have added 2 per cent normal up to $20,000. We do not add any surtax in our law below $20,000. It is a very small matter.

On $16,000 to $17,000, 16 per cent, and the British rate is 30⅝ per cent.

On $17,000 to $18,000, I propose a rate of 17 per cent. The British rate is 30⅝ per cent.

On $18,000 to $19,000, 18 per cent, against the British rate of 30⅝ per cent.

On $19,000 to $20,000, 19 per cent, against the British rate of 30⅝ per cent.

On $20,000 to $21,000, I propose a rate of 21 per cent. The British rate is 32½ per cent.

On $21,000 to $22,000 the rate which which I propose is 22 per cent. The British rate is 32½ per cent.

On $22,000 to $23,000, 23 per cent, as against the British rate of 32½ per cent.

On $23,000 to $24,000, 24 per cent, as against the British rate of 32½ per cent.

On $24,000 to $25,000, 25 per cent, as against the British rate of 32½ per cent.

On $25,000 to $26,000, 26 per cent, as against the British rate of 34⅛ per cent.

On $26,000 to $27,000, 27 per cent, as against the British rate of 34⅛ per cent.

On $27,000 to $28,000, 28 per cent, as against the British rate of 34⅛ per cent.

On $28,000 to $29,000, 29 per cent, as against the British rate of 34⅛ per cent.

On $29,000 to $30,000, 30 per cent, as against the British rate of 34⅛ per cent.

On $30,000 to $32,500, 31 per cent, as against the British rate of 35⅝ per cent.

On $32,500 to $35,000, 32 per cent, as against the British rate of 35⅝ per cent.

On $35,000 to $37,500, 33 per cent, as against the British rate of 35⅝ per cent.

On $37,500 to $40,000, 34 per cent, as against the British rate of 37½ per cent.

On $40,000 to $42,500, 36 per cent, as against the British rate of 37½ per cent.

On $42,500 to $45,000, 37 per cent, as against the British rate of 39½ per cent.

On $45,000 to $47,500, 38 per cent, as against the British rate of 40⅝ per cent.

On $47,500 to $50,000, 39 per cent, as against the British rate of 40⅝ per cent.

On 50,000 to $60,000, 40 per cent, as against the British rate of 42½ per cent.

From that time on the British rate remains at the flat rate of 42½ per cent, while the rates in my proposed amendment advance for each bracket 2 per cent, up to where the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island takes effect. It must be borne in mind that I have stated the sum of the rates applicable at each bracket and have not attempted to give the flat equivalent rate, which would be lower than the rates as I stated them.

Mr. President, that is all I care to say to-night.

Mr. SIMMONS obtained the floor.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina has been recognized. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I presume the Senator from North Carolina is going to move an adjournment or a recess?

Mr. SIMMONS. I rose for the purpose of moving that the Senate take a recess, but, if the Senator desires, I will withhold the motion.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to call the Senator's attention, if he will withhold his motion one moment, to a matter in order that he may give it some consideration, if it deserves any. I notice in the portion of the bill increasing the income tax a provision on page 2, line 3, and again in line 9, that this tax shall be levied during the year "1917 and every calendar year thereafter." I presume from the title of the bill, which is, "To provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes," that the intention was to have these taxes limited to the period of the war; but on examination of the bill I find nothing in the other parts of the bill limiting the operations of the bill to the period of the war. Neither do I find in any other part of the bill the provision that the taxes shall be imposed "every calendar year thereafter." I want to submit to the Senator if it would not be wise either to provide that the language should read "every calendar year during the existing war," or else to provide that the entire bill shall terminate at the conclusion of the war?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I will not stop to discuss that now. All of these taxes are spoken of as "war taxes." There is not in the bill any provision that the bill shall cease to be operative at the end of the war. It was thought best by the committee to leave that matter to the action of subsequent Congresses.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Again, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that entirely different language is used in describing the imposition of the income tax from any other tax in the bill, because that distinctly says——

Mr. SIMMONS. I will be very glad to examine that, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It distinctly says it shall be imposed every calendar year hereafter.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will be very glad to examine that, and I thank the Senator for his suggestion.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I think the point made by the Senator from Connecticut is well taken. I certainly recall on more than a dozen occasions during the discussion of this bill in the Finance Committee that the opinion was expressed that the bill should expire with the war, and I thought, until the Senator from Connecticut called my attention to it, that there was a provision in the bill that it should be inoperative after the war. I hope that the correction will be made, so that all men may know that these very burdensome taxes will expire with the close of the war.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the Senator will remember, the bill was written so that it could be repealed at any time and not interfere with the present law. Particular pains were taken to accomplish that result.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That may be so, and yet I call the Senator's attention to the fact that if it is so, the bill should not provide that income taxes shall be levied every year hereafter at the figures stated and not make similar provision with reference to any other tax.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I merely desire to add another word, and then I shall be through. The Senator from Utah is entirely right. As I understand, this bill is only for the war; it then drops off the fiscal statutory system, like a shell, and leaves intact the basic existing law. I for one expect after the war that the whole system shall be revised, and I hope to see a protective tariff adopted as the first source of revenue; but I think the time when this proposed statute shall terminate ought to be made a little more plain, as the Senator from Connecticut has suggested, and I have no doubt the chairman of the committee will be willing to have that done.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, every section in this bill declares it to be a war-tax measure. Whether the Senate desires to put in the bill a provision terminating it automatically when the war closes is a matter that we can take up later. I do not care to discuss that this afternoon.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I offer an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask to lie on the table and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

PROPOSED INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I ask permission at half past 4 o'clock to-morrow to address the Senate on Senate joint resolution 94. I do not wish to interrupt the proceedings on the pending bill. I do not want to inject my remarks in the middle of a debate on another subject, but the Senate is ordinarily weary at that time, and Senators who then might desire to retire to the cloakroom or to their homes could do so and not be out of order so far as I am concerned if the permission I seek is granted.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I did not hear the subject to which the Senator desires to address himself.

Mr. OWEN. It is Senate joint resolution 94——

Mr. PENROSE. I do not know these resolutions by number.

Mr. OWEN. It is a joint resolution which I introduced several days ago proposing an international convention as a war measure.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, would it not serve the Senator's purpose just as well to make the hour half past 5 and let us go on with this bill until that hour?

Mr. OWEN. I should be glad to make it half past 5 if that would be agreeable.

Mr. PENROSE. Make it 5.30, and then the Senator can take all the rest of the evening if he desires.

Mr. OWEN. I will make it 5.30 o'clock; that will be agreeable to me.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate take a recess——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, has the consent requested by the Senator from Oklahoma been obtained?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not understand that the Senator was doing more than giving notice.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; he asked unanimous consent.

Mr. OWEN. I asked unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the Chair will put the request. The Senator from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that at 5.30 to-morrow evening he may be permitted to address the Senate upon Senate joint resolution 94.

Mr. PENROSE. I object to any unanimous consent during the pendency of the revenue bill, but I think the Senator from Oklahoma can have every reasonable assurance that he will be able to go ahead at 5.30 o'clock to-morrow and continue indefinitely until the next meeting of the Senate.

Mr. OWEN. I will take the floor in my own right at some convenient hour to-morrow.

WAR WITH GERMANY.

Mr. GORE. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD without reading, amongst other things, the Pope's peace note and the opinion of Attorney General Wickersham with respect to the use of the militia in foreign countries.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter refered to is as follows:

TEXT OF POPE'S PEACE APPEAL AS OFFICIALLY ANNOUNCED IN LONDON.

"LONDON, August 15.

"The foreign office to-night issued the French text of the letter from the Pope to the King, inclosing a copy of his appeal to the heads of the belligerent peoples. The Pope's appeal is accompanied by the following letter from Cardinal Gasparri, papal secretary of state:

"'Your Majesty, the holy father, anxious to do everything he can in order to put an end to the conflict which for the last three years has ravaged the civilized world, has decided to submit to the leaders of the belligerent peoples concrete peace proposals exposed in a document which I have the honor to attach tc this letter. May God grant that the words of his holiness will this time produce the desired effect for the good of the whole of humanity.

BRITAIN TO DELIVER NOTE.

"'The holy see, not having diplomatic relations with the French Government or with the Government of Italy or the United States, I very respectfully beg Your Majesty to be good enough to have handed a copy of his holiness' appeal to the President of the French Republic, to His Majesty the King of Italy, and to the President of the United States. I also beg to add 12 other copies, which I request Your Majesty to be good enough to hand to the leaders of the nations friendly to the allies, with the exception, however, of Russia, Belgium, and Brazil, to whom the document has been sent direct.
